British jets to patrol Iraq exclusion zone and troops may protect Bosnia convoys

Major backs action on two fronts

BY ROBIN OAKLEY AND JAMIE DETTMER

JOHN Major and his senior ministers agreed last night to impose an air exclusion zone over southern Iraq to protect the Shia Muslims and to send British troops to Bosnia-Herzegovina to escort humanitarian aid convoys if the warring factions have agreed to let the relief trucks through.

Britain. France, and America. will tell President Saddam Hussein within the next few days that they will shoot down any Iraqi warplanes flying over southern Iraq. The ultimatum will be delivered later this week to the Iraqi ambasYork. Forces from the three allied nations will maintain a 24-hour presence over southern Iraq to stop Saddam's planes attacking Shia Muslims and marsh Arabs in the region.

Six RAF Tornado aircraft will be sent to enforce the "no-fly zone". The six British reconnaissance aircraft will be accompanied by two of useling aircraft and Britain's refuelling aircraft, and Britain's commitment to the allied force has no time limit. A senior British government source said last night: "We are determined to stop the repression of the Shias."

The action was agreed vectorion.

The action was agreed yesterday at the emergency meeting of the cabinet's defence and overseas policy committee for which John Major broke his holiday in Spain. The

Nicholas Lyell, the attorney general, that there was full authority for the planned action under existing UN resolutions. The allies have been considering the move for some days, following their growing irritation at what is regarded as

"quite blatant" attempts by the Iraqis to hinder the work of hu-manitarian and arms inspectors seeking to enforce the conditions of the Gulf war ceasefire. In what was intended as a lead signal to other European nations, the cabinet meeting also decided that Britain would commit a battalion group and its support elements up to 1,800 men — to escorting humanitarian relief convoys in Bos-nia if the UN asks them to do so. With fears that more than a million step up relief to the victims of the multi-sided conflict in the former Yugoslavia.

The meeting considered four options. The first was to step up the military escorts for those UN convoys which operate with the consent of the warring parties. The second was to provide relief con-voys with military escorts that could defend themselves against light opposition. The third was relief convoys with escorts strong enough to see off heavy opposition, and the final option was to send in multilareral forces to establish security corridors along which medical and food supplies could be sent.

The committee yesterday decided that options two, three, and four would rapidly slip one into another.

They estimated that options two and three would require the commitment of 100,000 servicemen. twe-thirds of the size of the British army, and that the option of establishing security corridors would amount to almost full-scale war with the commitment of 300,000 men. Downing Street sources said yesteday that the British troops would wear the UN blue helmets and they would not be sent there

"to fight their way to Armageddon".

If the going became too rough, and there was significant loss of life, the troops would be pulled out.

Mr Major and his colleagues have opted for stepping up the convoy escorts because they believe that taking any further military action might lead to attacks on UN agenUN inevitably to withdraw its relief

The cabinet committee met reached its decisions after nearly six hours of talks. In Washington yesterday the Bush administration released intelligence reports claiming that Saddam is building up forces in southern Iraq in preparation for a renewed offensive against the Shia Muslims. The intelligence agencies said that 40 to 60 Iraqi combat planes and 700 to 1,000 tanks had been moved to southern Iraq. They said that nine of Iraq's Continued on page 14, col 3

UN halts aid to Sarajevo after plane is threatened

FROM TIM JUDAH IN ZAGREB

UNITED Nations officials suspended aid flights into Sarajevo airport yesterday after an RAF cargo plane was re-ported to have been threatened by anti-aircraft gunners. Officials said that the incident happened at 8.50am after seven out of a planned 23 flights had landed safely.

The plane was taking off when an anti-aircraft position was reported to have locked on" with a target-seeking radar. A senior UN source said: "The plane fired flares and chaff to evade fire but was locked onto again. It was manoevring, the crew think 20mm anti-aircraft cannon."

Officials implied that the anti-aircraft gun position was held by Serbs but any sugges tion that the incident could lead to retaliatory air strikes was dismissed. "It would sur-

Bank sees little hope of growth

By George Sivell

BANK of England economists say slow growth of the British economy "should be evident during the remainder of the year" but the improvement in business and consumer confidence seen in May has not been sustained.

The Bank of England Quarterly Bulletin states the economy is still "bumping along the bottom" and that weak consumer demand and the slowing world economy will hold down British

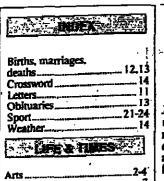

The lukewarm statement coincided with the release of official figures showing a mounting government deficit and a rise in the number of long-term jobless. The public sector borrowing requirement for the first four months of 1992-3 was £11.3 billion, against £5.9 billion for the same period last vear.

The number out of work for more than a year has risen by 64,000 to 905,000, the highest level for four years.

Sarajevo airport, which is under UN control, has been closed several times since opening to relief flights less than two months ago. However, this is the first time that an aeroplane is reported to have been threatened in such a manner. The airport was closed in the past because Bosnian and Serb fighters traded fire across the runway.

The central Europa hotel was hit by mortar fire sending up to 800 refugees into the night. One report spoke of snipers then firing on the refugees. Five people died in the attack and ten were reported injured. The Belgrade-based news agency Tanjug reported that Serb fighters in the hills around Sarajevo said that they had hit the hotel because Bosnian soldiers were firing from it. In the spring, as the siege of Sarajevo began, Bosnian units did occupy the building. While the use of refugees as human shields is a relatively common practice in the former Yugoslavia, it is not known if the Bosnians were still using the hotel as a Ishak Crnogorcevic, the manager, said that he would try to house the refugees in the remaining two storeys of the hotel and the basement "It will be very crowded," he said, "maybe 20 to a room, but we will take them all.

There is no other solution." Radovan Karadzic, the Bosnian Serb leader, denied that his men were responsible, suggesting that the attack had been carried out by Bosnians to provoke a military intervention which the Serbs were against.

Almost 1,000, mostly Serb. women and children left Sarajevo on their way to Belgrade in a convoy accompanied by UN armoured vehicles. The convoy was organised by the Children's Embassy charity which helped evacuate Croats and Muslims to the Croatian port

Jensen, car of the stars, is driven off the road

By KEVIN EASON MOTORING CORRESPONDENT

JENSEN, one of the most famous names in British motoring, was last night facing extinction, brought down by a combination of recession and a worldwide reaction against big fuel guzzling cars. The company, which made its first car in 1926, has been put up for sale after failing to move the market with its £100,000 high-performance $4 EFI, despite modest ambitions to make only 12 a year. Three of its 20 staff have been made redundant. in its heyday 40 years ago, 3,000 people were employed at its West Bromwich factory. Jensen carved a niche as a fashionable "muscle car after Clark Gable commissioned the company to build him a sports tourer based on a Ford V8 chassis. Cliff Richard and Henry Cooper drove

But unlike some of these showbiz drivers, the company failed to master the art of the comeback. Yesterday's announcement marked the second time that Jensen has expired during hard times. In 1976, the company went into receivership to be relaunched as Jensen Parts and Services. However, the business seemed to have found a saviour in the form of Hugh Wainwright, millionaire chairman of the property to engineering Unicorn Holdings. He bought a Jen-sen and then bought the factory. He backed the S4 EFI which used a 5.9litre American-built Chrysler engine and weighed two tonnes, almost three times the size of a Mini, gulping 16 miles to the gailon. tants from Grant Thornton in Birmingham have been called in. The decline of Jensen mirrors the fortunes of the British motor industry, once awash with interesting and innovative names. Many - such as Riley, Wolseley, Hillman, Sunbeam or Standard - have either been absorbed by multi-nationals or disappeared completely. Of the few remaining, Rolls-Royce is hanging on, but with few analysts believing it will survive as a wholly British-owned business. Honda owns 25 per cent of Rover, formerly BL Reliant, which went into receivership last year, is owned by Beans Engineering in the West Midlands, but is still trying to re-establish itself as a manufacturer of sports cars. Jaguar and Aston Martin are now owned by Ford while Lotus, also is owned by General

Gypsies attack camping curb as charter for persecution

By Rachel Kelly, property correspondent

GYPSIES and travellers face criminal offence to park a curbs on illegal camping as part of government proposals to give greater protection to landowners. The measures propose the ending of what Sir George Young, the housing minister, described yesterday as "the open-ended commitment" on councils to provide sites, and emphasise gypsies' responsibility to proride for themselves.

The government's proposals were made after an increasing level of public dismay at the behaviour of groups such as travellers. Sir George said. Existing legislation in the 1968 Caravan Sites Act was too loosely defined, and did not cater for the emergence of the group known as "New Age travel-lers": the estimated 5,000 mainly single, young, latterday hippies with little respect for other people's property who have emerged in the past three or four years.

Earlier this month, Hampshire police were called in to deal with 3,000 travellers who gathered at sites near Winchester and who set alight and vandalised a council-owned incinerator plant at Otterbourne.

Last night, the government's proposals were denounced by councils and gypsy groups representing the country's 13,500 gypsy caravans. Hughie Smith, president of the National Gypsy Council, who lives in a caravan on a site in Manchester with his family, described the consultation paper as "a modern-day charter for the persecution of gyp-

Mr Smith said it was particularly unfair to tar gypsies with the brush of the New Age travellers. "Hippies are being counted as gypsies," he said. "A gypsy is a travelling person who is born and bred on the road, and whose family has been on the road for generations, and for whom travelling is an economic matter. New Age travellers have no proper family structure and travel around in old buses looking for leafy glades to do their own thing.

Peter Challis, chairman of the housing committee of the Association of London Authorities' housing committee. said: "It is a shame Sir George has adopted a kneelerk response to this issue, rather than looking at it in a rational way.'

The government proposals outlined in the consultation paper, Reform of the Caravan Sites Act 1968, make it a caravan on any land without the landowners' consent. At the moment, unlawful camping is remediable under civil rather than criminal law. The government also suggests strengthening the powers of local authorities to deal with llegal campers.

Local authorities will be given powers to tow away illegally-parked caravans, if they obtain a warrant from magistrates, powers to prevent offenders from returning to the same site within two years once evicted; and powers for magistrates' courts to seize caravans as an alternative to fines in the last resort. The reforms would also mean that local authorities would no longer be obliged to pro-vide caravan sites for gypsies

Travellers in England and Wales would have to acquire their own land for sites and apply for planning permis-sion in the normal way. Sir George said that gypsies should also be encouraged to move into permanent

He said that the suggested changes were not designed to tackle public order problems caused by recent parties of New Age travellers. "Home Office ministers are looking urgently at what might be done in this area, in consultation with chief police officers and other interested parties." Mr Smith responded to the proposals by saying that few gypsies wanted to move into permanent accommodation. Only a small minority of gypsies want that. That is not e point of being a gypsy."

Mr Smith accepted the government's point that the growth in gypsy numbers, from an estimated 3,400 gypsy caravans in 1965, to nearly 13,500 today (an estimated 9.000 families) had out-stripped the provision of camps. More than 4,500 gypsies are now camped illegally on unauthorised sites, he said.

The reason was that councils had failed to provide enough legal sites, Mr Smith said. The Gypsy Council's 12point charter suggested that a remedy would be for local authorities to sell or lease land to gypsies and encouraged gypsies to develop land.

Local authorities said that making sites illegal would leave gypsies without any alternative but to camp illegal-"Where are the gypsies going to get the resources to set up their own sites?," Mr Challis demanded. "Where

Major breaks holiday for Bosnia talks

POLITICAL EDITOR

FOR yesterday's cabinet committee meeting on Iraq and Bosnia, John Major had to leave the orange and lemon groves of Candeleda in Spain, where he has been holidaying at the villa owned by his friend Tristan Garel-Jones, minister of state at the Foreign Office. Douglas Hurd has had to break off his walking holiday in Tuscany and will continue it in Britain while Mr Major heads back for a few more days in Spain.

Two other members of the defence and overseas policy committee of the cabinet were not recalled for yesterday's meeting. It was considered unnecessary to bring back Michael Heseltine, president of the Board of Trade, who is enjoying the cabinet's most exotic holiday, studying the flora and fauna in Fiji. Tim Eggar, the duty man at the DTI, attended in his place to tackle sanctions questions.

Chancellor Norman Lamoni, too, was left undisturbed with his family in Italy while Anthony Nelson, the junior Treasury minister. deputised. The sight of the Chancellor being hauled back from his holiday, some officials believed, might have given the impression that an economic crisis was looming.

Despite the length of this year's thirteen-week recess, and the weariness of politiand a fractious parliamenta ry session, the 22 members of the cabinet have not exactly scattered far and wide in August. Mr Heseltine apart, the only one to venture farther than Europe is Lord Mackay of Clashfern, the Lord Chancellor, who has stayed on for a week's break in California after attending the San Francisco conference of the American Bar Association. For all the Franco-British rivalry within the European Community, France is the most popular destination. Peter Lilley, the social security secretary, has spent some time at his holiday home near Dieppe and a week in the south of France. Gillian Shephard, the employment secretary, is touring in France, and her predecessor, Michael Howard, now environment secretary, is in

John Patten, the education secretary, has holidayed partly in France and partly in his Oxfordshire home. Tony Newton, leader of the Commons, is hoping to enjoy a few days in France later this month. Lord Wakeham, leader of the Lords, has sailed to Brittany with his family. David Mellor, the national heritage secretary, took his wife and children to Euro-Disney in France. The family are now together in Dorset. The offices of Sir Patrick Mayhew, Northern Ireland secretary, and of Kenneth Clarke, home secretary, the two top terrorist targets, understandably refuse to divulge their whereabouts, no doubt a blessing to Mr Clarke, who, as health secretary, was hunted down by the media on holiday in 1988 as nurses' pay talks collapsed.

But while it is natural for politicians to try to protect their families from public peeking it does seem a little stuffy of the Treasury to greet enquiries about Michael Portillo's holiday spot by merely saying it is "abroad". In fact, he has been in Barbados.

Ian Lang, the Scottish sec-retary, is on holiday in Jersey and Virginia Bottomley, the health secretary, has spent much of August at the family home on the Isle of Wight, popping into the office from time to time.

Those who have spent the bulk of their holidays at home are Malcolm Rifkind, the defence secretary, who has been in Scotland, William Walde grave, the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, and John MacGregor, the transport secretary. Agriculture minister John Gummer has remained close to the soil, spending most of his holiday time in his Suffolk constituency. But for some of his days off he has linked up with David Hunt. the Welsh secretary, for some sailing on the Broads. ## Long-term jobless level highest in four years

By Ross Tieman, industrial correspondent

THE NUMBER of people out of work for more than a year has risen by 64,000 to 905,000, the highest level in four years, according to employment department figures. Long-term unemployment rose in every region of Britain, but the increase was greatest in the South, including London, which is now suffering the highest level of unemployment

Gillian Shephard, the employment secretary, said there vere "tentative signs of improvement", because the rate of increase in the quarter to July was almost a third lower than in the previous two quarters. She added: "Despite this month's rise, long-term unemployment is still about a third lower than it was six years ago."

The number of people out of work for more than a year has risen by 397,000, or 78 per cent, since the current upsurge began. In the past year alone, the number has increased 313,000, or 53 per cent. One in three of 2.76 million unemployed benefit claimants has now been without work for more than a

The number of people out of work for more than six months is also rising fast. In the quarter to July, the total rose by 52,000 to 1.49 million. More than one in two unemployed benefit claimants have not worked for more than six months, despite the introduction of compulsory interviews with JobCentre officers after six months of claiming benefit.

The number of unemployed benefit claimants aged under 25 was 823,300 in July, almost a third of the total. However, the rise over the past 12 months, at 87.000, or 12 per cent. suggests that while young people continue to bear a disproportionate part of the burden of unemployment, the increase over the past year has been bigger among older people: Britain's jobless rate for under 25-year-olds, at 17 per cent, remains below the European Community average of 18.4 per cent.

The most startling change over the past year has been the rise in unemployment in the South to match levels in the North, which have been high since the recession of the early eighties. Overall, London has a seasonally-adjusted jobless rate on a par with the West Midlands at 10.6 per cent, against a national average of 9.7 per cent and 11.2 per cent in the North. ☐ Labour reacted to the latest surge in the long-term jobless by condemning gov-ernment inactivity in the face of the recession and demanding measures to revive the economy and put people back to work (Nicholas Wood writes). It also said the new figures on public borrowing were yet more evidence of the

Frank Dobson, Labour's employment spokesman, said: "The message for Mrs Shephard is: 'Don't just stand there, do something. What's needed are immediate tax incentives to business to invest in new plant and equipment, the release of council funds to put life back into the housebuilding market and more, not fewer, resources to invest in training.

The public sector borrowing requirement has ballooned to £11.3 billion in the first four months of the year, compared with less than £6 billion for the same period last year. Gordon Brown, the shadow chancellor, said that in Norman Lamont's hands the economy was unravelling with disastrous consequences.

NEWS IN BRIEF

Republican leader killed in Belfast

The leader of an outlawed Republican paramilitary group was shot dead yesterday after travelling from his Dublin home to Northern Ireland to sort out feuds within the organisation (Richard Ford writes). Jimmy Brown, 35, commander of the small Irish People's Liberation Organisation, was shot at point-blank range as he sat in his parked car in Belfast. Last night, the IRA said it was not responsible for the killing. It was understood Mr Brown may have been killed by people on the fringe of his group and that his death was not linked to differences within it.

A gunman approached the Ford Orion car outside a Gaelic Athletic Association club and fired, ritting Mr Brown in the head. Witnesses said that Mr Brown seemed to know his killer. Mr Brown, who had been in Belfast since Saturday, had said that he intended to deal with feuds in the group which centred on suspicions that members had set up the killing of a key figure in the organisation, a splinter group of the Irish National Liberation Army. Mr Brown was freed from a 15-year prison term for conspiracy to murder police after his conviction, based on supergrass evidence, was quashed on appeal.

Appeal on sentence

The Director of Public Prosecutions has been given leave to appeal against the sentence imposed on a woman soldier convicted of killing her lover's wife. Susan Christie, then a convicted of killing her lover's wife. Susan Christie, then a member of the Ulster Defence Regiment, was jailed earlier this year for five years for the manslaughter of Penny McAllister, wife of Duncan McAllister, a captain in the Royal Signals. She was acquitted of murder. Evidence was given at the trial that Mrs McAllister had been slashed across the throat. After the trial, Christie's father said that his daughter had expected a longer sentence. She had intended to study an Open University course while in jail, but had cancelled the plans because her sentence was not long enough to see the course through, he said. The appeal against the sentence will be mounted on September 9.

Newscasters are being asked to use more commonly spoken Welsh and to speak more slowly. Beautort Research, of Cardiff, surveyed Welsh-speaking strongholds such as Caernarfon, Holyhead and Blaenau Ffestiniog, all in Gwynedd, for S4C as part of research into attracting more viewers. Jill Gregson, Beaufort's associate director, said: "We found people had difficulty understanding the news because of the style of the language." About 500,000 people in Wales, approximately 20 per cent of the population, speak Welsh.

Jail chief goes private Private security firms are seeking to recruit prison service

managers as the government presses ahead with plans to contract out prison services (Richard Ford writes). A former governor of Strangeways prison in Manchester, which the government plans to privatise, has joined the private sector as director of projects with Group 4, the organisation that has the contract to run the Wolds prison in Humberside. Walter MacGowan joined Group 4 two weeks ago and is involved in projects related to the privatisation of prisons and prisoner escort services. Group 4 has also offered a job to Charles Erickson. 50, the number three in the remands contract unit at the Home Office but this approach has been referred to Sir Robin Butler, head of the civil service, to see if it breaches guidelines

NHS charges 'higher' The threat of an increase in prescription charges to about

£4 per item yesterday prompted Labour accusations that service. The Opposition claims came after the health secretary Virginia Bottomley had defended past increases and did not rule out another next spring above the rate of inflation. Before the election, charges were raised by 10.8 per cent to E3.75. An increase of 25p or 6.7 per cent, nearly double the present level of price increases, would push the figure to £4. In a newspaper interview, Mrs Bottomley accepted that "tough decisions" would have to be taken and defended the principle of increases. The health department said that no decision had been taken about next year's charges.

Science cash plea

The government and industry must provide more money to improve the public's understanding of science, Sir David Attenborough said yesterday as the British Association for the Advancement of Science prepared for its annual meeting next week. Science failed to capture the public imagination and inform the nation's culture as it once did, he said. The association, formed to promote the understanding and development of science, was facing a financial crisis with over half its income coming from shortterm grants and other unassured sources. The association was living "hand-to-mouth" while tackling a key subject.

Nail gun death verdict

A man died from extensive brain damage when he shot himself in the head with a nail gun, an inquest was told yesterday. Raymond Farrell, 23, of Southall, west London, used the gun while at a health centre in Hanwell after being told that he could get no help in obtaining a pair of trainers for his bad feet, the inquest at Hammersmith was told. Recording a verdict of death through misadventure Dr John Burton, the coroner, said it was amazing that "these lethal weapons" were not classified as firearms.

Legionnaire's check

An ambulance station is being checked for Legionnaire's disease after the death of an ambulanceman. Roger Moule, who was in his forties, died in Southampton General Hospital on Monday night after three weeks in intensive care. Three other staff at East Park Terrace ambulance station. Southampton, reported sick. All have now returned to work after suffering breathing difficulties, a dry cough and a high temperature. The Department of Communicable Disease Control is conducting an enquiry.

Lord Chancellor asks public to look beyond the judiciary's robes

HOME CORRESPONDENT

THE Lord Chancellor, Lord Mackay of Clashfern, will tomorrow invite the public, law abiding and law breaking, to join the seemingly endless argument over the courtroom dress of the legal profession when he publishes a consultation paper on the vexed topic of whether judges and barristers should shed wigs, robes and gowns.

The paper will provide full details of the colourful costurnes worn by the British judiciacy, including who wears knee breeches, buckle shoes, stockings and a lace jabot under a violet robe with lace (acing: who wears a black robe with lilac facing and a red band over the shoulder, and when scarlet robes and ermine are worn. Britain and the Irish Republic are the only EC countries where wigs remain de rigeur in higher courts for both judges and counsel.

The legal profession has been wearing wigs for hun-dreds of years and earlier efforts to dispense with wig and gown have not always been welcomed. Shortly after Irish independence in 1921, wigs were abandoned in part of the country but were restored six months later after court decisions were called into question.

Wearing wigs was the acceptable social convention 200 years ago but by the end of the in 18th century, gentle-men were abandoning them. In 1832, William IV permitted bishops to stop wearing them. Even in the 19th century, the attire of the English judiciary was capable of producing surprise to the European visitor. Alexander Henzen, visiting a court in 1843, commented on "the comicality of the medieval" scene and the vision of judges wearing a fur coat and

Trauma still haunts human shield victims

By NICHOLAS WATT

NEARLY two years after their triumphant return home, Saddam Hussein's 'human shield" hostages are still coming to terms with their ordeal.

Many are still unemployed. those lucky enough to have found jobs in Britain have had to take big pay cuts, and the trauma of their captivity still haunts them.

Some of the hostages complained yesterday that the government had ignored their plight. The only interest shown by officials was to de-brief them on their return home to glean any war secrets they might have picked up, they said. Patrick Herbert, who was picked up by the Iraqis a month after the invasion of Kuwait, said that the former hostages wanted understanding, not charity. "The Foreign Office are the most uncaring people. They pushed the United Nations to make Saddam pay compen-sation from his oil revenues but they have refused us loans to tide us over until he pays up. ## Lack of casualty beds 'is risking lives'

By Alison Roberts

LIVES are at risk at a London hospital's accident and emergency department because bed shortages force staff to send patients to other hospitals, nurses say.

Treat and transfer", a sys-tem in which patients are admitted and almost immediately moved on, was in operation at the Charing Cross Hospital, in west London, twice last week, coinciding with the closure of ward 9 north, which specialised in treating diabetics. Nurses say the system is used whenever the hospital is full. Jeanette Anderson, representing the hospital's members of Cohse, the health service union, said this happened up to two or three times a week.

Mike Mitchell, senior registrar at the accident and emergency ward, denied lives were at risk. But he said the system was unsatisfactory and operated throughout London. "There are also times when patients go into casualty and all the trolleys are occupied by people waiting to go into the wards." The situation was likely to worsen after the Tomlinson enquiry report, due in the autumn and the resulting shake-up of London hospitals. "Some are going to close which will put pressure on others.

John Smith, the hospital's representative for Nalgo, the local government officers' union, said the situation was "horrendous". Care was inadequate when emergency patients were being ferried several miles across London to another hospital.

The closure of 9 north, which was responsible for the bed shortage last week, was managed in a callous way. They gave us a week's notice and we had nurses crying because they did not actually know what was going on. They are now applying for vacancies within the Riverside authority, but staff are very apprehensive about other jobs because of the Tomlinson enquiry." The North West Thames

Regional Health Authority recommended closing the Charing Crosss accident and emergency ward, which has 600 beds, in its enquiry submission. It says the Westmin-ster and Chelsea Hospital, which takes its first patients next year, will cover the area's accident and emergency needs. The hospital will replace four older hospitals.

The authority said: "We recognise that it has been a particularly difficult time for staff. We have been negotiaring with unions and staff for many months and will continue to do so." There would be redundancies.

Head says she was sacked

THE head teacher of a leading independent school has left her post unexpectedly, claiming to have been sacked after disagreements with governors. Helen Gichard, the head of Haberdashers' Monmouth School for Girls, opposed plans to integrate some sixth-form classes with boys at the neighbouring Monmouth School. Both schools are part of the Haberdashers' Foundation. and share the same chairman of governors.

A letter to parents said that joint teaching arrange-ments had been discussed by the governors and Miss Gichard over a long period. "Although there are areas of agreement between them, there remain important differences of view. As a result, it has been agreed that it is in the best interest of both the school and of Miss Gichard if she relinquish her appointment.

Brian Jenks, the vicechairman of the governors, said yesterday that both sides had agreed to make no further statement, but Miss Gichard told the Western Mail: "I was not asked to resign or given a chance to tender my resignation."

Walkers say pussyfooting councils allow landowners to flout law over public rights of way

Ramblers accuse local authorities of negligence

By CRAIG SETON

A LIST accusing local auth-orities of failing to protect public rights of way from deliberate obstructions by landowners was published by the Ramblers' Association yesterday.

The list identifies county councils and other public bodies accused by the association of fails and other desired. ation of failing in their duty to assert public rights of way. and accuses farmers and other landowners of deliberately ploughing, planting over and illegally obstructing footpaths with walls and fences. It gives examples of ramblers alleg-edly being intimidated by farmers or dogs into leaving footpaths.

The publication of the list is part of an autumn campaign by the 89,000-strong association, which is becoming more militant in its determination to keep 140,000 miles of footpaths in England and Wales open. The campaign will culminate in a For-bidden Britain Day on September 27, when thou-sands of ramblers will walk on dozens of obstructed paths to "reclaim" them.

The association's national officials said yesterday that there was growing evidence that local authorities were ne-glecting their responsibilities under the Rights of Way Act, 1990, which was designed to improve public access to the countryside. David Beskine, co-ordinator of Forbidden Britain Day, said at a press conference in Ladbroke, Warwickshire, that while landowners' bodies praised the national path network, thousands of farmers and landowners were obstructing paths and many negligent local authorities were allowing them to get away with it.
"We will not allow the lawbreakers, the negligent local authorities or anybody else to get away with robbing the country walk," he said. "This sured by local people throughout Britain."

Bob Coles, an association official from Northamptonshire, said that ramblers had been wrong to think the Rights of Way Act would be their salvation because it had laid down clear duties on landowners. Local authority rights of way officers were short of staff and complaints took an age to resolve.

Criticising the "softly, soft-ly, pussyfooting" approach of councils, he said that ram-blers were made to feel guilty if they asked a farmer to clear crops from a footpath. The new law will only be followed by the farming community if local authorities are willing to enforce it. In the meantime, the farmers are indulging in

The press conference was told that nearly 500 of 2,200 complaints about footpaths in Leicestershire in the past year related to routes that had been blocked by crop planting, ploughing or other ob-structions such as barbed wire, chained gates or manure heaps. A Countryside Coumission survey in 1988 found that 22,000 miles of rights of way in England and Wales were umusable because of obstructions and 26,000 miles were classed as poor.

The association said that, due to neglect by the county council, an area at Whitford, Clwyd, had more than 100 footpath problems. Many difficulties remained in Cumbria, where a farmer in the Penrith and the Border constituency of David Madean, the countryside minister, was alleged to have persistently caused trouble for ramblers.

The Ramblers' Association campaign will also tackle other issues. It will protest at quarrying plans that it says will devastate a popular wood near Newark, Nottingham-

In Warwickshire, the association is fighting to reopen rights of way that it says exist on old county roads that are now unused and have been ploughed over and planted by farmers. One such route highlighted by the association is near Labroke. After yesterday's press conference, local ramblers found that the landowner had opened up access to the route. A dispute continues over whether it is private land or a public

RAMBLERS in Oxfordshire will have to wear hard hats when they follow the route of a long-distance footpath through a new golf clubhouse being built on top of it (Craig Seton writes).

Local ramblers are to protest about the obstruction on Forbidden Brtitain Day on September 27, when they will walk along the route.

Other areas highlighted for obstructions on footpaths are Buckinghamshire, Devon and Kent. The Blackdown hills in Devon, a designated area of outstanding natural beauty, are criss-crossed by illegally obstructed paths.

Debts push down property prices

THE housing market re-mained depressed during the second quarter of the year because of gloom about the economy. Confidence continued to be people owe more than their unemployment, says the latest survey of the Royal Institution of Chartered Surveyors. ## Llamas offer new hope to ailing woollen industry

Llamas from South America yielding superfine wool are well-suited to living in Britain, Michael Hornsby reports

HOME-REARED llamas and cashmere goats could revive Britain's ailing wool industry and provide hard-pressed sheep and cattle farmers with a new source of income, agricultural experts say.

Wool accounts for no more than five per cent of income on the average British sheep farm nowadays, barely covering the cost of shearing. In the hills, sheep farming is viable in many areas only with subsi-dies amounting to nearly £30

For the past three years, 100 guanacos, cinnamon-hued cousins of the llama, have been learning to adapt to British conditions at the Institute for Grassland and Envi-ronmental Research at Aberystwyth, Dyfed. Guana-cos are regarded as wild animals in their South Ameri-can homeland and domesticating them has never been

Gwyn Moseley, the head of the project, said: "We chose guanacos because they produce extremely fine, high quality fibre. They are hardy animals, used to life in harsh conditions, and have turned out to be quite easy to handle. They will graze alongside sheep and cattle and happily eat weeds, thistles, brambles, rushes and other forage that most livestock will not touch."

Wool fineness is measured

thousandth of a millimetre The value of a fleece increases dramatically when the diameter of individual hairs drops below 20 microns. Ordinary sheep's wool measures around 30 microns.

Dr Moseley says his best-performing guanacos produce fleece with a mean diameter of 14.5 microns, better than the finest Chinese cashmere. "We shear once a year and expect to get about one kilogram of wool, which we think will sell for as much as ESO. At the moment a sheep's fleece is fetching no more than £1 to

The market for guanaco will be tested this autumn when David Emanuel, the fashion conturier who designed the Princess of Wales's wedding dress, launches a garment made from a bolt of silky honey-coloured cloth woven from Dr Moseley's animals. The Welsh Development Agency is also studying the feasibility of setting up a specialist mill in Wales to process wool from guanaco, alpacas and other members of the camelid family Wendy Hendy, project manager of the agency's "garment initiative", who brokered the marriage between Dr Moseley and David Emanuel, said: "I think high-profile couture designers and upmarket textile retailers are going to want this exciting new fabric for their clients."

Wild and woolly: Dr Gwyn Moseley with his herd of guanaco in the Welsh hills. Their fleece is better than the finest Chinese cashmere

The main restraint is small volume. The British Camelid Association, founded six years ago, has about 180 members, owning no more than 1,500 animals between them - 200 uanacos, 300 alpacas and 1,000 llamas. The animals cost about £1,000 each to import, with Chile the main source because of disease in Peru and Argentina. Researchers in Scotland, which has terrain well suited to guanacos and alpacas and a long-established spinning and weaving industry, are seeking Angus Russel, of the Ma-caulay Land Use Research Institute in Aberdeen, sees cashmere goats as a more immediately attractive option for farmers. Britain imports and processes some 2,000 tonnes of cashmere a year, about 40 per cent of world production, but produces no more than one tonne from the estimated 6,000 goats being reared here.

Dr Russel thinks this will change. "If you take away the subsidy they are getting, most sheep farmers in hill areas would be making a loss.

Cashmere goats are viable without subsidy and well-suited to British conditions. There is also an established market for the product," he said. A cashmere fleece, he says, can fetch £25 to £30.

All goats produce cashmere, the fine undercoat grown close to the skin, but the fineness and amount varies greatly. In co-operation with 18 local farmers, Dr Russel is creating an elite herd by cross-breeding goats from around the globe, including Siberia, Iceland and New Zealand, in search of the quality.

Chinese goats produce around 200 grams per animal, a yield that would probably need to be doubled here to schieve viability. In China,

Yard officer presses banks to curb credit card fraud

A SENIOR Scotland Yard officer yesterday appealed for the introduction of "safe" credit cards after a report which says that more sophisticated plastic crime is costing the country at least £165m a year. According to the report, by Readers' Digest, based on a poll of 2,049 people conducted by Mori, many thefts help to finance a criminal network that is linked with drugs and pornography.

Det Chief Inspector Alan

Brown of the Yard's central cheque squad said the public, banks, shops and other financial institutions could do much more to combat the crime which, he estimated, cost closer to £400m. In particular, he asked the banks and finance houses to follow the lead of the Royal Bank of Scotland, which he said had issued 8,000 cards bearing the holder's photograph and laser-etched signature. He called for more secure methods of delivering credit cards through the mail and warned people never to divulge details of their cards to Mr Brown said the menace of "tele-marketing" fraud was spreading from the United States. It involved criminals advertising for goods to be bought by credit cards so that they could then use the numbers on fraudulent cards they manufactured.

Nearly two out of three cardholders surveyed thought the banks and other card issuers could do more to combat fraud and 69 per cent said shop assistants should check purchasers' identities more thoroughly. About two million cards are lost or stolen each year, nearly 5,500 a day. and in many cases the thief is helped because the holder has written down the personal identification number (Pin).

Mori shows that, in spite of the fact that no fraud had been involved in the cards bearing a photograph, 58 per cent of cardholders said they would not pay extra for a photo-card or a thief-proof smart card Just over a quarter said they would pay £2 or more a year

Russell Twisk, editor in chief of Readers' Digest, said stolen cheque books backed by guarantee cards sold for £3 to £10 a cheque. Credit cards and debit cards such as Switch fetched up to £150 and charge cards such as American Express, which have no credit limits, could sell for £200. They were often sold to "clearing houses" and then resold at

Although the deputy editor who let him into the building got her bag back, cheques and cards were used for fraud valued at more than £1,000.

Mr Twisk said: "Innocent people are attacked for possessing plastic but both public and banks act as though it is someone else's problem." With 30 million people in Britain holding 83 million cards, all the signs were that plastic crime would continue to be a growth industry.

Later, a spokesman for the Royal Bank of Scotland said that 28,000 customers held laser-etched cards.

A decision on whether to offer them at all branches would not be made until the end of the year. A Barclays Bank spokesman said: "As we always advise

By Simon Tait -

THE former Bishop of Gal- ried teenage mothers from way, who resigned earlier this , nural communities sent to vear when he admitted fatherhood of a 17-year-old boy, is supporting a play at the Edinburgh Fringe Festival about the Roman Catholic church's sent to work in the Magdalen mothers.

Punchbag Theatre Company of Galway, which is making its first appearance at the fringe, said that Bishop Earnon Casey is patron of the company and has donated £200 a year to it. He has also given dothing from his own wardrobe for use in the production. The play, Eclipsed, is the first by Patricia Burke Brogan, who was a novice nun in the 1960s when she witnessed how nuns treated the young unmarried mothers who worked in convent laundries after being cast out by their families. Sean Evers, the director of the play, said: "Bishop Casey is a good friend of mine. He knew the type of work I was interested in and was very supportive. It was unfortunate that he had to resign . . . I have not seen him since the scandal broke and I don't believe he has seen the play."

The affair that forced the bishop to resign involved him using church funds to support his illegitimate son and the boy's mother. The bishop's disgrace occurred at a time when a teenage girl who had been refused an abortion

Bush heartens party's dispirited soldiers

FROM MARTIN FLETCHER IN HOUSTON

THE Republican party finally girded for battle with the Democrats yesterday, the pas-sion of its dispirited foot soldiers ignited by a fiery performance from President Bush on Monday night, an inspirational convention address by Ronald Reagan and the red meat rabble rousing of Mr Bush's old antagonist. Patrick Buchanan

Making a highly unusual appearance at an eve-of-conrention Houston pep rally, Mr Bush warned America to pre-pare for "the most stirring bolitical comeback since Hary Truman gave 'em hell in 1948". If the Houston Astroiome was the eighth wonder of the world, this would be the ninth, said the incumbent who is trailing by 15 to 25 soints in the polls. Exhibiting the fire and determination so lacking to date from his re-election efforts. Mr Bush claimed that Bill Clinton was already measuring cur-tains for the Oval Office. "Put those drapes on hold," he declared. "It is going to be curtain time for the [Demo-cratic] ticket, and I mean it." For nine months, he said, the Democrats had had a

First lady steels herself for battle

There is a hard edge to the sweet old lady many believe Barbara Bush to be, Anthony Howard writes from Houston

WHEN Barbara Bush rises to iddress the Republican con-ention on television primeime tonight, she will not intirely be creating a precedent. At least two of her predecessors as first lady have ione the same: Eleanor Rooevelt in 1940 and Nancy Reagan in 1984. But neither perhaps had quite as much iding on their performance as Mrs Bush will have tonight.

The theme of the first lady's address will be "family values" and to emphasise them she will be joined at the podium by ner five children (four sons and a daughter) and a dozen of her grandchildren. In all 71 members of the Bush family dan are reported to be attend-ng the convention. The decision to exploit the irst lady's own personality is ınderstandable enough. Polls show her as being almost three times more popular than her husband and twice as well regarded as her opposite numper in the campaign, Hillary Linton, the wife of the Demo-ratic challenger.

The latter finding is at first right surprising. Mrs Clinton, a successful lawyer in her own ight, appears a far more likely ole model for contemporary American women than the 57-year-old grandmother who poasts of having given up her own college career in order to narry her husband at the age of 19 in 1945.

Yet if many American women clearly identify with he wife of the Democratic andidate, it is the motherly figure in the White House whom they apparently admire. It is even claimed that Mrs Bush, the beneficiary in part of a sharp contrast in style and dress sense with Nancy Reagan, has become the most popular first lady of modern towards abortion. Her much quoted comments that she does not think it is the kind of issue that should have any place in a party platform will have done a good deal to reassure the majority of Republicans, also unhappy with the party's hardline position on the subject.

The skill with which the first lady has hinted at her own views while always refusing to disclose them suggests that she is not quite the simple, uncomplicated soul that is sometimes made out.

She certainly has a sharp tongue. One of her first ques-tions to an author who recently went to see her to discuss a book he was writing was. "Who picked that tie?" The unfortunate man replied his wife had. The reply was devastating: "And you married ler?"

Insiders claim that the first lady is a much more formidable political presence within the White House than the popular legend allows. Not all views of her influence are flattering. She is reputed to be particularly hard and unforgiving towards staff members who, she feels, have let her husband down.

Married to George Bush for 47 years, she may well be the last president's wife built in the old-fashioned image. America is coming to terms with a more independent, assertive, independent breed of spouse. But whether her eventual successors will prove to be as politically formidable as the matronly figure in pearls remains to be seen.

As soon as the convention is: over she is heading off to California, where her husband is trailing disastrously in the state opinion polls. She has said that she can face the rospect of life after the White House doubt her capacity to fight very hard indeed in order to ensure that the change in the family's lifestyle is post-

one way conversation with the American people, but now it's our turn." Republican delegates whooped and cheered and chanted: "Four more years" as Mr Bush told them: "When history writes about this election, they're going to say it started right here when you fired up this American president." The convention was off to a pretty good start, Mr Bush said yesterday, but unlike Michael Dukakis the Democrais' 1988 nominee, Mr Clinton made clear that he would not give his opponent a clear run this week. Responding to a barrage of abuse from Republican convention speak-ers, the Arkansas governor began to air television advertisements in Houston and Washington that damned Mr Bush's economic record and claimed that the Republicans were responsible for the largest tax increases in American history.

Meanwhile, the highly conservative social manifesto that the Republicans adopted on Monday inflamed an angry demonstration that night by several hundred Aids and gay rights activists who marched on the Astrodome. They were confronted by police in riot gear who made scores of arrests when they started burning barricades, placards and effigies of Mr Bush. Earlier, 41 anti-abortion protesters were arrested outside a Houston abortion clinic.

Mr Reagan, now 81, received a tomultuous ovation. The former president who reportedly complained last winter that his successor doesn't seem to stand for anything" endorsed Mr Bush "warmly, genuinely, whole-heartedly". However, timetable slippage meant the vintage performance by the Great Communicator was too late for prime time television.

The stakes in this election were high, Mr Reagan said, saying that the Republicans had won the Cold War by standing strong in the face of liberal criticism and accusing the Democrats of running down America. Still more important for a beleaguered president whose conservative support is weak, Mr Bush also received the endorsement of Mr Buchanan, the right-wing political commentator who had challenged him so ferociously for the Republican nomination.

Glossing over deep philosophical differences with Mr Bush, Mr Buchanan told supporters on the convention floor that there was a religious and cultural war being waged for the soul of America. The Clinton camp was on one side, but "George Bush is on our side, and so we have to come home and stand beside him." Mr Buchanan's speech cappéd a day in which successive speakers had ripped with mounting ferocity into Mr Clinton, his wife Hillary. and the Democrat-controlled Congress that Mr Bush blames for obstructing all his initiatives. The day provided a foretaste of what promises to be an ugly campaign.

Mr Reagan used his speech to celebrate the collapse of communism, which he said he and Mr Bush had engineered.

red convention visitors in Houston this week another five letter word is even more prevalent "Where?"

In a metropolitan sprawl as big as the average English county, with absolutely nothing within walking distance of anywhere else, the conventioneers spend half their time careering along a tangle of eight-lane freeways in the wrong direction, or searching bopelessly for venues with five-digit street numbers and not a pedestrian for miles. If you think their problems end each evening when, drained and trembling, they finally reach the convention centre, think again.

The great glittering Hous-ton Astrodome sits in the middle of the even vaster Astrodomain, a 267-acre complex that also includes the Astroarena, the Astrohall and a boundless expanse of scorching asphalt car park where the absent-minded could mislay their vehicles for

The Republicans are using only half of the Astrodome. They have split the 70,000seat stadium with a 3.5-tonne curtain, but on Monday night not even Ronald Reagan could fill the tiers upon tiers of seats that rise to the heavens. You could fit New York's Madison Square Garden in here twice. The guidebooks say you could build a 15-storey building within it and still play tennis on the roof.

It is a harsh world. Samuel Skinner, dismissed as White House chief of staff last week, stands almost unnoticed by a wall. A clutch of women posing for photographs with a lowly congressman deserts him for a passing state governor, who is himself abandoned when a famous senator is spotted. But to the gall of the politi-cians, television anchormen

US police investigate Woody Allen

Police in Connecticut and New York are investigating allegations that film-maker Woody Allen abused one of the chidren who lives with Mia Farrow. Allen's publicist denied the abuse charges, and said that no criminal charges had been brought.

Allen, 57, is suing Farrow, with whom he has had a relationship for 12 years, for custody of their three children, and has confirmed that he is having an affair with Soon Yi Previn, 21, a Korean-American who was adopted as a child by Farrow and her former husband, the musician Andre Prevîn. The abuse complaint against Allen arose earlier this month when Farrow, 47, took one of her 11 children to a doctor in Connecticut and asked him to examine the child. By law American doctors are required to inform the police when there is a suggestion of child abuse. Farrow's lawyer, Alan Dershowitz, who has de-fended Mike Tyson, Leona Helmsley and Claus von Bulow, said she had not initiated the criminal investigation. Ben Macintyre, page 10

Bahamas electorate decides on future of 'King Ping' FROM DAVID ADAMS IN MIAMI

AFTER 25 years in power Sir Lynden Pindling, the Bahamian prime minister known popularly as "King Ping" — is going for five more in elections today on the Caribbean coral archipelago off the Florida coast best known for its sunny beaches and secret bank accounts.

Mr Pindling thinks he is a lucky man. As on previous occasions he has chosen a date whose digits add up to ten -August 19. His ruling Progressive Liberal party, which has overcome frequent controversy and scandal in six previous elections, is favoured to win, but the opposition Free National Movement has capitalised on a severe economic downturn to run a close race.

The Liberal party has shown signs of nervousness after a series of government setbacks. Tempers frayed last week when government supporters reportedly threw shells at opposition activists and attacked them with baseball bats and cutiasses, wounding two people. Despite the difficulties of exercising control over 700 islands and 2,000 small cays that make up the 600-milelong Bahamas chain, Mr Pin-dling, 62, has successfully exploited a tradition of political patronage in the islands to maintain a secure parliamentary majority. With a population of 254,000 - and 125,000 registered voters in only 49 constituencies — the margin between victory and defeat need only be small. ## Arabs hesitate over Western move to close Iraqi air space

Assad: reluctant to give America support again

BRITAIN, France and America have announced that they are co-ordinating plans to close the airspace over south-ern Iraq to Iraqi fighter planes. But many of the 26 allies that took part in the Gulf war have not been consulted and several Arab countries have voiced strong reserva-tions over any renewed hostilities.

The White House said on Monday that the Bush administration had been consulting its Gulf allies but refused to give details of military options. Mr Bush angrily denied press reports that he was seeking to provoke a confrontation with President Saddam Hussein He expressed confidence, however, that the Gulf war coalition would act together in trying to enforce United Na-

No meeting of the Western European Union is planned, nor of any other ministerial forum. But the Foreign Office said yester-day that the question how to enforce Iraqi compliance with UN security council resolutions has come up in almost all meetings on the Gulf of the allies and European partners for many months. Britain and France have kept their partners informed of all security council deliberations. More intensive discussion of the issue has been conducted with the coalition partners in the Middle East, in particular Kuwait, Saudi Arabia and the other Gulf states. British, French and American diplomats have been in constant touch with the governments in Riyadh and Kuwait on the logistics and timing of any renewed military action.

Other countries that contributed to the Gulf war effort. such as Singapore, Argentina, New Zealand and the Philip-pines, are unlikely to be brought into any planning of pumitive strikes or exclusion zones. outside the region.

Britain and France recognise that America would bear the brunt of any military

Ban on flying 'will hasten Saddam fall'

By Michael Theodoulou in nicosia AND HAZHIR TEIMOURIAN IN LONDON

IRAQI opposition groups last night hailed the West's plans to set up an exclusion zone in southern Iraq, which they said would accelerate President Saddam Hussein's downfall by demoralising his armed forces, perhaps leading to mass defections.

The ban on Iraqi overflights south of the 32nd parallel would prevent Saddam flying in troop reinforcements fast to trouble spots, opposition leaders said. It would also prevent him using helicopters to hunt army deserters. "It will be a huge blow to army morale," Ahmad Chalabi, the co-ordinator for the Iraqi National Congress, a lition of opposition groups. said. The coalition had met James Baker, then American

TESHOT

Secretary of State, earlier this month to urge the establishment of a safe haven for the Shias. Dr Chalabi said whole army units, particularly Shias, could defect as they find hundreds of miles from Baghdad.

The Iraqi opposition had opposed American plans for air strikes on targets in Baghdad which they said could win sympathy for Saddam while doing little to alleviate the suffering of the Iraqi people. But there was no indication the West was willing to do more than defend the Shias from attack. Diplomats said that, for Shia insurgents to be an effective tool to remove Saddam, they would need to be armed and trained by the West which is worried about hastening the disintegration of Iraq and leaving the south prey to Iranian fundamentalist influence. Kuwait and Saudi Arabia, long wary of their own Shia minorities, have expressed similar fears.

Some Shia opposition lead-ers are sceptical about Western tactics. "I am not very hopeful that the intervention will be more than symbolic," said Saad Salih Jabr, leader of the Free Iraqi Council. "It has everything to do with the American elections and little to do with bringing about real change in Iraq."

Mr Jabr believed that Saddam could easily comply with an order to exclude his aircraft from the south without losing face. "He would still use his armour and artillery, and he could even go on with his plan to destroy the marsh Arabs by polluting their rivers with oil. Just remember what he did to the oilfields of Kuwait." he said.

Ebrahim Ahmad, the founder of the Kurdistan Democratic Party of Iraq and leading member of the Patriotic Union of Kurdistan, hoped that the Western allies were serious about ending repression in the south, as they had been in the "safe havens" of Kurdistan. "For too long, the West has avoided forcing Saddam to comply with the Security Council's Resolution 688, which demands an end to the repression of the various peoples of Iraq," he said.

Baghdad's outrage over the proposed new flight ban was voiced by the official press, which described the West's plans as a "conspiracy and act of sabotage and aggression". Al-Iraq newspaper accused the United States and "the imperialist countries" of shedding crocodile tears over the plight of the Shias, whose real enemy, it said, were Iranian

As well as the flying ban, opposition figures said it was essential to have UN human rights monitors on the ground in the southern exclusion zone. UN and foreign aid workers have only ever had a tiny and restricted presence in the

The dangers facing the few UN personnel even in an exclusion zone were highlighted yesterday when it was revealed a Swedish UN guard was shot and wounded near the Kurdish-controlled northem city of Sulaymaniyah on Monday. Lars Hjelmquist was wounded in the abdomen and arm by bursts of gunfire when his car was ambushed. There was also a bomb attack on a Danish UN guard post in northern Iraq on Monday. There were no casualties. Baghdad has denied responsibility while the Kurds have blamed Iraqi intelligence infiltrators. While Saddam opposes the UN presence as a humiliating infringement of Iraq's sovereignty, failure to co-operate with the mission of Jan Eliasson, the UN envoy, would almost certainly lead to more pressure from the security council and give President Bush yet another opportunity to pick a fight.

Embargo and poor harvest threaten safe haven

AS ALLIED forces proceed with plans to create an exclusion zone to protect the Shias in the southern marshes of Iraq, there are warnings that the Kurdish safe haven in the north may be in danger of collapse this winter.

The Kurds face the twin foes of an inadequate harvest and a widening economic embargo. Relief agencies speak of the need to make up a shortfall of about 180,000 tonnes of grain when the supply route from the Turkish border is blocked by rival Kurdish insurgents.

Iraqi Kurdish leaders now complain of being caught in the jaws of a vice, the Iraqi regime advancing from the southern highway forming one jaw and the Kurdistan Workers' Party (PKK), which wants to use northern Iraq as a base for its guerrilla operations against Turkey, forming the other. The PKK, in reaction to the Iraqi Kurds' cooperation with Ankara, is staging a campaign of intimidation against Turkish lorry drivers who once ferried food or fuel over the border.

According to the road haulage association in the southeast Turkish city of Gazian-tep, exports of food and supplies, estimated at £15 million for the first half of this year, have now all but ceased. Unless action is taken now, the Kurds face a winter of "disillusionment, despair and disorder", according to John Foran of International Medical Relief who has worked with the Kurds since 1985. This involves setting up a fair system of distribution to deal with the shortage and organising a system of convoys to break the PKK blockade.

The PKK are doing Saddam's work for him." said Massoud Barzani, leader of the Kurdistan Democratic Party which has already been in armed clashes with the Turkish Kurds. Such fighting is likely to intensify. The other large Iraqi Kurdish party, the Patriotic Union of Kurdistan, has released documents to the London-based al-Hayat newspaper which purport to give evidence of a link between Iraqi intelligence and the PKK.

Mr Barzani, in London on a tour of Western capitals, reported a change of attitude in Washington. America, as evinced by its protection of the Shias, is now prepared to tolerate a looser federation in Iraq, short of its complete disintegration. The remaining problem is to convince a still highly nationalist Arab opposition to be similarly flexible, he said. Mr Barzani will also hold talks with the Turkish authorities on his way home in September. Although Turkey cannot be displeased at the divisions being sown between the PKK and the parties of the Iraqi Kurdistan Front, it must react eventually to the apparent surrender of authority within its own

The problem facing the Iraqi Kurds is holding out that long. Although most of the food delivered by the Turkish lorries went to Mosul, a city under government control, the trade also yielded a customs excise which formed the Kurds' principal revenue. For months, the civil administration in the north has worked without payment. Now there is nothing to meet the cost of the peshmerga guertilla armies and their dependants. The newly elected Kurdish assembly is also unable to purchase this year's

allied flag-showing sorties probably would be mounted.

"We can respond very quick-ly if the Iraqis put a plane in that area," officials said. To deal with any incursions, General Nelson can call upon the 20 F-14, 20 F/A 18 and 20 A-

Mr Hekmatyar repeated his offer of a ceasefire on condition that the militia with drew from Kabul in a week.

US has enough planes and ships in place to keep skies clear

AMERICAN warships and aircraft based in the Gulf are capable of policing effectively a "no-fly" zone in southern Iraq and of waging a short, sharp punishing air war against Baghdad if that should prove necessary. Since the confrontation with President Saddam Hussein over the request by United Nations weapons experts for access to Baghdad's agriculture ministry last month, there has been an American military build-up in the region, ostensibly part of planned joint military exercises with Kuwait. The Pentagon has been refining plans to knock out the recently rebuilt Iraqi air defence systems and has come up with a list of target options. They may include defence-related ministries in Baghdad, although some Arab governments have expressed disquiet about the prospect of the allies attacking Pentagon Gulf preparations include the completed transfer to Riyadh of an air battle group, Jamie Dettmer writes

In readiness for any Iraqi retaliation in the form of Scud missile attacks on its Gulf neighbours, the United States has deployed anti-missile Patriot batteries in Bahrain, Kuwait and Saudi Arabia. All the Patriot batteries now in the Gulf incorporate technological improvements developed since

The group, led by Lieu-tenant-General Michael Nelson, also has the capability and equipment to direct bombing raids, if called upon General Nelson will rely on about 80 American aircraft based at Dhahran and 78 aircraft based on the carrier, USS Independence, now patrolling in the Gulf, to monitor and police the "no-fly" zone. It is unlikely that the general will

Americans have the capability to monitor anything that flies in the region. Surveillance will be mounted in any operation by two Boeing E-3D Awacs early warning and command aircraft and by a U-2 spy plane. It is understood that General Nelson may request one of America's Boeing/Grumman E-8 surveillance planes, nicknamed J Stars Both J-Stars are still being tested, although they took part in their first missions during the Gulf war. The J-Stars can pinpoint a stationary object, such as a tank, from well over 100 miles and can survey 386,100 square miles exclusion zone south of the American warplanes deployed in an eight-hour sortie. Surveillance of the air exclusion zone will also be monitored by the radar systems on the 17 ships in the USS Independence's battle group.

"Anything that moves in the Gulf, we can see it." Bill Taylor, a retired army colonel and warfare academic, said.

"We can know when an aircraft comes up, what speed it is flying, what direction it is going in and, generally, what type of aircraft it is." Pentagon sources said last night that it was unlikely that a constant combat air patrol would be flown over the exclusion zone on the services of the amerati-carrier. USS Sanatoga, which at present is in the Adrianc. Within a day of receiving orders the Sanatoga could be in the eastern Mediterranean and playing a role in the Gulf. In all there are 26,000 American ground troops in the Gulf. If the imposition of an air exclusion zone leads to decision to bomb Iraq, then all the hardware is in place.

Cold will kill more Bosnians than civil conflict, UN fears

UNITED Nations relief officials say more people could be killed by the approaching Balkan winter than have died in more than a a year of fighting in the former

They say the cold will bite not just in the devastated siege cities of Bosnia-Herzegovina but also in refugee and prison camps across the former federation. "The bitter Balkan winter is supposed to be famous," Sylvana Foa, for the UN High Commission for Refugees, said last night. Citing reports from the UN agency workers in the field, she added: "Winter could very likely prove to be more deadly than the fight-ing." At least 18,500 people are known to have died in 14 months of conflict in the former Yugoslavia, although the total is probably higher. Charles Lamunière, a UN

Greater Serbia rises again

The Serbian warlords have succeeded in capturing almost everything they wanted in Bosnia, Roger Boyes writes

THERE is a certain L smugness nowadays about Serb leaders, both among the calculating politicians in the large offices of Belgrade and among the wardords in Bosnia.

The reason is simple: Serbia has captured almost everything it wanted in Bosnia and can enter the London peace talks next week as a generous partner. The frontiers of Greater Serbia are almost sealed; all that remains is to bring Serbs in tousle haired psychiatrist who leads the Bosnian Serbs, put it succinctly: "We now control 70 per cent [of Bosnial, yet we only claim 64 per cent. This was a some what perverse statement. Ethnic Serbs account for less than one third of the 4.3 million population of Bosnia. But the old mathematics, based on census results, have been discarded. Guns rather than electronic calculators dictate the new reality. There are pockets of Muslim resistance within the new Greater Serbia and they so irritate the local Serb commanders that they throw everything at the unfortunate cities of Bihac in the northwest corner of Bosnia, and Gorazde in the southeast. The United Nations can perhaps save these enclaves; or the Serbs may choose to call off their siege as a bone to be thrown to the peacemakers next week.

What, and who, else can saved? President Izetbegovic of Bosnia will enter the London talks with only a mini state, a few hundred square idlometres around Sarajevo. There is no meaningful Bosnian administration any more, no Bosnian economy.

The Bosnian president's only hope is to press for a United Nations protectorate that would rebuild the state in its old frontiers. Most of the European Community, Austria and Slovenia would accept this since it would ease the flow of refugees.

The Bosnian Serbs and the Bosnian Croats are not so certain. For Belgrade, a UN protectorate would be acceptable only if it allowed the Serbs to hold on to most of the captured land. Anything that seems to legitimise Greater Serbia is welcomed. The Serbs stopped, or reduced, their fighting in Croatia last January at exactly such a moment; the territorial gains had been made and the UN presence was a guarantee of sorts that the Creats would not income a

> There is a difference how-There is a unlike Belgrade, Zagreb has recognised the old Bosnia-Herzegovina as a state, has proposed a Bosni-an-Croat confederation and doser economic co-operation. The Croat leadership is not propelled by a messianic vision, like the Serbs, but by the assumption that Bosnia-Herzegovina will be split into ethnic cantons. It is staking out its claim in advance of a political settlement.

The London conference may have the makings of a settlement if only because the Serbs have snatched what they want and are almost ready to stop fighting. There is a moral issue: should the West agree in any way to the dismemberment of Bosnia Herzegovina? What kind of precedent does this set for others who want to change frontiers by force? Some face can be saved by insisting on the guaranteed return of refugees to Serbian-held ter-

In practice, few refugees will want to come back. It is probably too late to turn the clock back: Bosnia, as recognised by the EC in April, no longer exists. Serbia holds the land and only a Western war against Serbia could reverse the situation.

Mario, aged three months, gurgled happily on a coach seat. But his mother was not smiling. They have been parked in a shed for three days. With 258 other refugees they left the northern Bosnian town of Bosanska Dubica on Saturday. Now they have become a pawn in a trial of Serbs and the UN.

The former motorway maintenance sheds and offices had been empty since Croat fighters were driven out of the Okucani area, 75 miles southeast of Zagreb, last summer. Now the miserable, mostly Muslim, refugees are living there in their buses, or on bare concrete floors exposed to the elements by gaping shell holes

Their tale is unremarkable.

Most of the adults were dismissed from their jobs three months ago. Increasingly they came to fear for their lives. Many men were taken away to Serb-run detention centres. There were frequent shootings and bombings of Muslim properties. Fifteen days ago they signed forms declaring "voluntarily" that they wanted to leave the area. "There was no food, there were no cigarettes and there was no more freedom," one woman said. Jasmina, 15, said: "Every day we went to the Red Cross and they said not today. On Saturday they said 'go'." Four buses were laid on. As the 260 crossed the bridge to an enclave of Serb held Croatia, which is under UN control, valuables and cash were taken from them. "Don't write how bad it was," one terrified woman said, "all our families are still there."

According to Major Vijay Thaper, the UN civil affairs officer, the refugees were allowed to enter the UN zone because the Croatian govern-ment had not told the UN that, from Saturday, it was going to enforce a ban on any s. The 26O 8 living off the rations provided by the UN's Nepalese battalion. They are stuck in limbo, too terrified to go home and angry with the Croatians for not letting them out of Serb and UN-controlled territory. "We don't want to go to Croatia," one man said. "We all have family in Germany and Austria; just help us get there, please."

Rubbish surrounds the buses, including thousands of old motorway toll tickets and piles of manure. A few hundred yards away are the wrecked toll booths of the Okucani exit of old Belgrade to Zagreb motorway.

On a coach seat lay a child's teddy bear. Its shirt bore the slogan: "No Problem". In the shed little boys whooped as they sent their darts flying up to the ceiling. They were made from motorway toll tickets weighted with spent bullet

Yesterday, Peter Kessler, spokesman for the UNHCR, described the Bosanska Dubica arrivais as "leakage". In fact, they are a test case. If the Croats let them in, even if only in transit, then more will follow. United Nations officials believe that, instead of large number of people being pushed out in single convoys, small groups will be allowed, perhaps avoiding the media spotlight. In the squalid sheds in Okucani the trial of strength has begun.

Sukhumi: Georgian troops, backed by tanks, seized control of the Abkhazian capital of Sukhumi yesterday, and a military council was appointed to rule the rebellious region. Anna Broide, a Russian journalist reached in midafternoon by telephone inside the Abkhazian council of ministers' building, said Georgian troops had fired at the headquarters and set the parliament building on fire. A duty officer at the government building said the attack had left several buildings on fire, and explosions could be heard over the telephone line. There was no word on casualties. A reporter who arrived in the city several hours later did not see any fires burning.

New Agers dig for Bacon's world of peace and happiness

Bacon: the focus of a

ARCHAEOLOGISTS yesterday began encavating in the grounds of a church in Williamsburg Virginia, parily in search of a "book of Utopia" written by Sir Francis Bacon, the Elizabethan niosopher and statesman, and partly to put an end to a bizarre historical controversy that has focused on the site for half a century. Since the 1930s, a sect of New Age mystics named Veritat has argued that a vault in Bruton parish churchyard holds a blueprint for world happiness and eternal peace written by Bacon and hidden there on his instructions - a claim which is based on some historical research and a lot of credulity. For years Veritat, based in Los Angeles, has tried to persuade the church authorities to permit an extavation lobbying local people and carrying out illegal night excavations of its own. This month the church's gave permission for professional archaeologists to carry out an

While there is scientific evidence to suggest that something is buried beneath the churchyard after radar tests in 1986 revealed an object 10ft square and 10ft underground, the department of archaeology of Colonial Williamsburg says the history society is more interested in the remains of an early church on the site built in 1683. "We don't believe there is anything of Francis Bacon's down there, but we want to kill two birds with one stone." Patrick Milleman, of Colonial Williamsburg, said. The decision to undertake an excavation was greeted with cautious enthusiasm by the Sir Francis Bacon Research and Historical Society of America, while members of the New Age sect remain persistently convinced that the dig will reveal the secret to world peace, as conceived by who died in 1626, never travelled to the New World. That belief is based on the theories of an elderly Christian mystic named Marie Bauer Hall, who came up with the theory in 1938 after studying Shakespeare's works, which the group believes to have been written by Bacon.

The New Agers not only believe that the vault holds the key for world redemption, but may also contain proof that Bacon was the son of Elizabeth I. Some of the most extreme disciples of the New Age also believe that it contains her lost crown jewels, the first edition of the King James Bible, and original copies of the US Constitution, the Bill of Rights and the Declaration of Independence. Bacon writings about the New World have led them to the conclusion that he thought "important documents" governing body finally capitulated and the great Elizabethan writer. Bacon, not believe the graveyard contains anything of interest, and wish the New Age pilgrims, some of whom have previously set up camp outside the graveyard, would just go away. A year ago, three members of the

sect stole into the graveyard and began digging up the plot again. A judge ordered them to stay away, but they dug another hole two months later, whereupon they were charged with trespassing and destruction of church property. The three New Agers then apparently left the state, and there is a city injunction against their

Since then, the mystics have been lobbying the local parish to permit an excavation, and had apparently planned a media onslaught to propastate their theories starting next month. This month, the Bruton parish church board finally gave permission for the dig - to put a stop to the debate and to get a little of that world peace for Williamsburg's townsfolk.

Undressing in Russian

the classroom, and the 20 minutes leading up to the break were the same eternity, punctuated by recurring mirages of chocolate biscuits. The old habits popped back into place, even to the finger kept in the vocabulary list at the back of the book in case a mental block should strike during my turn in the spotlight. I have spent a month at an intensive Russian summer school in preparation for going to work in Moscow, and can vouch for the prickly satisfaction of reliving the classroom in adulthood: the pleasure of learning is intensified by the nostalgic frisson of being back behind a graffiti-covered desk, chanting unfamil-

At the next desk sat a middle-aged customs officer from Heathrow who wanted to know how to ask suspected smugglers to undress, in the politest possible way, in Russian. The sole aim of the Anita Brooknerish lady opposite was to read Tolstoy in the original. The chauffeur from Hertford wanted to get involved in charity work in St Petersburg, and there was an eccentric retired military man who, for reasons we never discovered, was intent on learning to write out the Lords's Prayer in Cyrillic script.

t was all a heartening reminder that, despite Britons' reputation for being bad at foreign languages, our enthusiasm for attempting them in adulthood is unaffected. The Association for Language Learning insists that we are not, anyway, as bad at languages as we think: shyness and lack of exposure to foreign tongues outside school are the problem. Teenagers from Scandinavia to the Balkans buy British pop records and queue for the latest American films, thereby learning quite naturally that languages are fun.

However, acquiring a spoken language skill demands a certain desire to show off — an art at which we do not excel. Making a fool of oneself is probably the fear most deeply rooted in the British soul, and learning languages demands that one does just that now and then. I was recently proud to find I could communicate with an Albanian peasant in Russian, only to discover that my questions about the size of his land sounded to him like an offer to buy, and that the family cow was being led hopefully towards me.

There is a powerful psychological regression in returning to the study of tongues. Fifteen grown-ups who had been chatting about their gardens, mortgages and children before the start of the first class metamorphosed rapidly into quarrelsome 12-year-olds once more, shamelessly competing for the teacher's favour. We hissed the right answers under our breath when a neighbour was in trouble, sighed at the slowness of our classmates and giggled at the eagerness of the swots.

udmilla called us (pensioners included) "my children" and once dispelled our collective early morning stupor by charging in shouting: "Today we will scale the Everest of imperfective verbs without oxygen." Her methods were everything that the trendier exponents of language teaching despise. She gave scant attention to the array of technological aids the faculty had provided, referring to the much-prized "self access" learning centre with its satellite TV, videos and computer games with dismissive Russian intonation as the "self-excess place". Nor would she entertain the notion that it does not matter how you speak but whether you are understood — a theory that has churned out a generation whose French consists of a string of nervously unconnected words as random as Jacques Derrida's prose.

She had just received a circular from a language teachers' association advising that literacy should take second place to communication in the classroom. "Nonsense," said Ludmilla. "Who wants to communicate with an illiterate wally anyway?" And we bent our heads to literacy once again. It was a month of rediscovered joys: of lassoing a wayward verb. nailing slippery pronunciation and reading one's first poem in the original. Around the polytechnic corridors I would glimpse fashionably rumpled lecturers muttering that grammar wasn't the thing at all, it was understanding television that mattered. No thanks. I'll scale the Everest of imperfective verbs the hard way, with nothing but the old tingle of fear at being caught daydreaming to aid me.

Has Woody Allen joined that group forced by fame to play a starring role? asks Ben Macintyre

or the past 12 years a quiet daily ritual has taken place in New York's Central Park. A small, shambolic figure wearing a floppy hat and thick spectacles would wander from the east side of the park to the west and back again. The park-keepers, panhandlers and joggers would nod to him, alert tourists might recognise him and demand an autograph, but usually Woody Allen was noticed but undisturbed as he wandered back and forth to visit Mia Farrow, the actress with whom he has shared more than a decade of companionship, three children, but never a home.

That rite, abruptly ended last week, was one of many by which the film-maker has become indissolubly part of New York. His favourite deli, cinema and bar are all part of the city's folklore. The news that Woody Allen has ended his relationship with Mia Farrow, is suing for custody of their children and is conducting an affair with one of Ms Farrow's adopted children, 21-year-old Spon-Yi, a Korean-row's adopted children. 21-yearold Soon-Yi, a Korean-American, has done nothing to alter the perception of many New Yorkers that Allen's life and films are one and the same, nor that his life is essentially that of

New York itself: chaotic, neurotic and mordantly hilarious.

"Woody Allen's fans are perhaps more intimate with him than any audience has ever been with a celebrity," wrote one Allen biographer. "They identify with him. They lust after him. They imagine themselves as him. And they dream about him."

The city's obsession with Allen is only marginally less pronounced than the film-maker's obsession with himself.

is only marginally less pronounced than the film-maker's obsession with himself. Introspective to the point of neurosis, Allen's friends say his self-doubt is laced with personal if selfmocking ambition, and he is acutely conscious of his image. "I don't want to achieve immortality through my work," he once said. "I want to achieve it through not dying."

The con of a Brockho odd ich.

The son of a Brooklyn odd-job man, Martin Konigsberg, and Nettie, a book-keeper, Woody Allen has forged a relationship with film-goers, particularly those in New York, that is unique in its confessional quality. Although he has always denied that his films are autobiographical, nobody ever believed him.

He has habitually cast his lovers in lead roles, usually playing opposite himself. Mia Farrow has appeared in eight of his last 13 films, and before that Diane Keaton was his co-star. Ingmar Bergman, the film-maker on whom Allen says he models himself, has also tended to portray his personal life.

imitating art, but they may also

For a man who has always claimed to be intensely shy, Allen's recent pronouncements on his affair have been astonishingly public, almost rehearsed. "Regarding my love for Soon-Yi," he said in a statement, "it's real and happily all true. She's a lovely, intelligent, sensitive woman who has and continues to mm around my life in a wonderfully positive way." That remark, down to its garbied syntax, is a line from a Woody

Allen script.

"I have much more to say about this matter," he added. For Allen, the farrago of his private life, soon to be played out in a child custody court, already has elements of the grand performance to it. No doubt he would prefer not to have to endure public scrutiny of his sex life, but the unwritten law of fame, which requires that actors must behave in character, may leave him little choice. He has never balked from discussing sex ("the most fun I ever had without laughing") on screen, and he is playing along now.

His films may even play a part in that lawsuit. In Manhattan he observes: "I'm old-fashioned.

I don't believe in extra-marital relationships. I think people should mate for life, like pigeons or Catholics" — this from a character, a neurotic writer in his forties, who is having an affair with "a girl who does homework".

Some of the script of that film, possibly his finest. may now make the 57-year-old actor-director wince. In it he tells his 17-year-old lover (Mariel Hemingway): "But you're a kid, and, and I never want you to forget that you know... I want you to enjoy me, my wry sense of humour and astomishing senual technique... As long as the cops don't burst in we're, you know. I think we're going to break a couple of records."

The cops, however, may be on their way. State police in Connecticut are reported to be investigating an allegation that Allen previously abused one of Mia Farrow's 11 children, a charge denied by the acror's publicist.

As he struggles to defend himself and gain custody of his children, and as a city ponders the fate of one of the strangest and furniest men alive, Woody Allen may well be wondering whether life could possibly be more like the movies.

Bush and the missing magic

he old trouper returned to the boards for the opening night of the Republican convention and almost stole the show. Now a frail 81-year-old, Ronald Reagan has always been the type of politician whose appeal is difficult to categorise. He never seemed to want to be more than the nice guy in the movie, the hero's best friend who, if he never gets the girl, at least wins the sympathy of the audience.

Dwight Eisenhower, the only other post-war president to serve a full two terms in the White House, possessed much the same ability to appear likeable. The secret of their success was probably the same. Both men used their personal popularity to break through partisan battle lines, and though neither was exactly energetic in office, each won a brace of smashing electoral victories as a result.

Mr Reagan's achievement, if only because he handed over a constituency intact to his successor (something that Ike was unable to do for the young Richard Nixon), is probably the more considerable. Indeed, until a few months ago, it looked as if what he had put together was an entirely new pattern of public support for the Republican party. Just as Franklin Roosevelt built the old Democratic coalition, so Reagan deserves the credit for constructing a fresh combination of interest groups that, with luck, would allow the Republicans to emerge, if not quite as the most powerful political force in the land, then at least as the party most regularly trusted with controlling the executive arm of government

Fear that that whole legacy is now in jeopardy explains the jumpiness which has so far characterised this year's Republican convention. The prospect of George Bush's defeat may not by itself break too many loyalist hearts; but if he takes down with him, as he would inevitably do, the dream on which the party has pinned all its hopes, then every Republican footsoldier will feel a sense not just of loss but of Mr Reagan's speech on Monday night was crafted to try to persuade the old believers not to throw it all away. (He and his successor have never been particularly close — their wives even less so — so the prominent place given to the former president in the convention programme tells its own tale of the dire straits that the Bush campaign believes itself to be in.) Yet there is nothing like an old actor for rising to the occasion, and after a hesitant start the ex-president did his successor proud.

The snag, though, is that his erstwhile admirers are not really Ir Reagan's to deliver. It be that he can still command the legions of the religious right, although their new hero remains the darker figure of Pat Buchanan, the man who challenged the president in the primaries. He, too, was brought to the podium to swear fealty to the Republican ticket, but his speech was much uglier and more menacing in tone. It may have been a wow in the hall, especially with the groundlings, but how it will have played with the voters outside is another question.

The God squad is plainly important to the Republican party — it has, after all, largely dictated this year's platform —

but by itself it is not going to determine the election result. The voters who look destined to do that are those known as "the Reagan Democrats" — the blue-collars and hard-hats whom the Great Communicator wooed away from their former Democratic allegiance into the Republican column. They now pose the greatest danger to President Bush's re-election, and a single night's display of nostalgia is hardly likely to be enough to win them back.

Mr Bush's problem is that he has never been strong on what used to be called "the lunch-pail issues". Like Anthony Eden, whom he in some ways resembles, his whole career has been made in foreign policy, and he has never claimed to be expert or experienced in anything else. That may not have mattered so long as the contest with the Soviet Union ("the evil empire" of Reagan's famous phrase) remained a vivid threat in the forefront of American minds.

But the collapse of communism has altered the nation's sense of priorities and there is little sign that the dogged effort to turn the victory of liberty over tyranny into a specifically Republican triumph has yet made much impact with the electorate.

The truth is that this looks likely to be a highly domestic election, and it is the president's perceived failure to deal with problems at home that is liable to be held most against him. If one factor has characterised the American way of life it has been the buoyant belief held by families at every economic and social level that, whatever else happens, their children will be able to look forward to better and more cheerful lives than they have had. The most alarming omen for the Republicans this November is that, under the weight of the recession, that conviction has ceased to be an article of national faith. It was Ross Perot who first tapped this vein of popular anxiety, and the fact that the polls show his former supporters splitting four to one in favour of the Democrats is the measure of the uphill task that the Republican party now confronts.

resident Bush's answer, delivered at his first meeting with delegates outside the convention hall on Monday night, is to promise that everything will change once he takes the gioves off and starts to fight. Quite apart from the obvious riposte that he has left it rather late, there is a difficulty about the tactics he apparently intends to employ. Time and again, in a blitz of television interviews, he has declared his objective as being "to define his opponent".

If that means launching the same no-holds-barred assault on Governor Clinton with which he destroyed Governor Dukakis four years ago, the president could be in for a nasty shock. For the other significance of Perot's aborted campaign was the disaffection it reflected with the ways of politics and politicians

The best advice to Mr Clinton is probably that, whatever the provocation, he should resolve not to react in kind. If he keeps his cool, it may well need more than the memories of Ronald Reagan's magic to save the carefully created new Republican coalition from falling apart just as decisively as the old Democratic one did after Bobby Kennedy was killed in 1968.

That is how so many of them ended up being called Bitten By Green Blobs and Dances with Stings and so on. At a guess.

And guesswork is the procedure, here in Dr Brocard's surgery, whither I have hobbled on one leg which looks like a leg and one leg which looks like a leg and one leg which looks like a bag of rugby balls, for while he has some English and I have some French, neither of us has enough of either to identify what it was that sank its arsenal into my calf yesterday, so we have to proceed by a sort of verhal identikit.

Nevertheless, we do finally converge, thanks to my having got a good look at my attacker four centimetres long, six green Anglepoise legs, feathery red in some the trunkload of unguents we had carted down to Provence for just such an emergency, but when I woke up this morning I realised that this hadn't been just antennae, orange polka-dotted wings, and somewhere hidden in all that extravagant and misleading frippery, like a Borgia stiletto concealed in a hand-tooled Psaiter, a poisoned hypodermic capable of inflating a human leg to twice its normal size.

I got a good look at it only because it was good to look at. It landed on my knee yesterday as I lay supine on the poolside grass, and as I watched it mince delicately about my shin, I felt that fashionable oneness which yokes us all together, large and small, upon this teeming planet. I felt that proper reverence at God's niftiness with blueprint and spanner, and I felt that warm glow which suffuses us when a dumb animal seems happy in our company.

I say feel, but I did not know what feeling was until a good half-minute had passed, when it transpired that the thing was not ambling about just because it liked me or because it wished to prance its finery, it was looking for a decent picnic spot, which it finally found halfway across my

I know that that was what it was after, i.e., lunching rather than stinging because when I stopped shricking for long enough to swipe it from my calf, it left there a hollow proboscis full of blood. So I shricked a bit more and sloshed on some stuff from the trunkload of unguents we had carted down to Provence for just such an emergency, but when I woke up this morning I such an emergency, because there was a bag of rugby balls in bed with me, proving that the unguent was a fat lot of use.

unguent was a fat lot of use.

Not as fat a lot, mind, as the leg itself. But it is deflating now, thanks to Dr Brocard's having stuck his own equally painful needle into me to tap off a bathful of water, and while I am lying here on his bunk digesting a handful of antihistamine pills, it occurs to me that there could well be a book in this, because of all the wonderful books thrown together by Englishmen in Provence, none of them tells you

English swatting is easy, we have only the wasp and the gnat and they both look horrible, even foreigners know where they are with these, but down here there are a thousand different nasties and very few of them look it, most of them look as though Fabergé were still in business, and you do not want to start lashing or aerosoling lest you expunge something as good as it is beautiful, which you do not discover it isn't until it has taken a lump out of you.

So I shall spend the rest of my holiday asking locals about Big Green Blobs Like Eyes But Not Eyes, and so forth, and I shall compile a comprehensive hit-list, and then I shall come home and find a publisher smart enough to agree that the optimum format would be a large, thin, flexible paperback with a wipe-clean laminated cover. With something like that, you wouldn't have to be Peter Mayle to make a killing.

Never say toujours

PROVENCE without Peter Mayle is surely as unthinkable as Avignon sans le pont. But reports that after making a fortune out of his books on southern France. Mayle is about to down his last bottle of Côte du Rhône and head for the even sunnier climes of California are apparently true. The author of Toujours Provence has finally said suffice and has been spotted house hunting on America's west coast.

Besieged by tourists turning up unamounced, Mayle has jealously guarded what remains of his privacy and changed his telephone number for an ex-directory one. But the influx of tourists to Mayle's village of Ménerbes is likely to grow even worse. The BBC has recently finished filming a 12-part series based on the books starring John Thaw. By next summer locals fear Ménerbes could be the Blackpool of Provence.

Paul Eddy, a British journalist living in the village, says: "We've heard that he may be moving house but we hadn't realised that he might be moving country. He has so little to do with the community here that they probably wouldn't notice if he went. The worry is that the television series will perpetuate the myths and attract even more tourists."

Gray Joliffe, the cartoonist who co-produced the Wicked Willie books with Mayle, says that apart from the odd Christmas card he has not heard from his former collaborator. "I have never even been invited to Provence. It wouldn't surprise me if he moved. It must be getting quite hot with tourists turning up the whole time." Mayle was in touch with his publisher Hamish Hamilton yesterday after the rumour surfaced. A spokesman said of their conversation: "It is confidential" — a strange comment, perhaps, concerning an author who has made his fortune by disclosing every detail of his life in France.

If he does move to America, Mayle is likely to keep his Provence home, where he at present lives with his second wife Jennie. His first wife and five children already live in America. Locals will be sorry to see Mayle go. Villagers say they are pleased to have un célèbre in their midst. Perhaps fortunately for Mayle his books have not been translated into French and few locals read English. Whether Mayle-ism will extend to California remains to be seen.

DAVID MELLOR, who according to his office has been on "a family touring holiday of Britain", has also found time for extensive European travel in recent weeks. So far this month he has been sighted at Euro-Disney and the Salzburg Festival, not to mention Barcelona. Most recently he turned up at the Bayreuth Festival in Bavaria with a male companion and stayed for the whole of last week, attending a complete cycle of Wagner's Ring.

Mellor was staying at the £100-anight Bayerscherhof Hotel, where he was to be seen doing his home-

work with Walkman and libretto

prior to each evening's performance. The minister may or may not have been delighted to find Jeremy Isaacs among his fellow opera-goers at one performance. Mellor is rumoured to be keen to see a successor to Isaacs as directorgeneral of the Royal Opera House and discreetly avoided the Arts Council's biggest client throughout the evening. The production? Götterdämmerung, of course.

FEW today remember Jess Conrad, the early Sixties pop star and actor, but the Royal Mail, it seems, has not forgotten. Conrad, now 57, recently lost a golf ball embossed with his name at a charity golf tournament at Hazelmere in Buckinghamshire. Someone — neither he nor the postman knows who — found it, stuck a first-class stamp on the ball and dropped it without envelope or address into a nearly pillar box. Shortly after, the postman delivered the ball to Conrad at his home in Denham. "I thought it was hysterical," says Conrad. "It shows we're efficient," says John Woodford, manager of the letter's delivery office at nearby Uxbridge.

BALKAN REALITY

To prove that his government is "doing something", John Major has offered to send up to 1,800 ground troops to help protect United Nations aid convoys in Bosnia. And as president of the European Community, he is to chair the opening of the London conference on former Yugoslavia next week. Britain has spent much time and energy calling together all those who could influence events in the Baikans. But the conference threatens to become an expensive fiasco.

The threat lies not in the boycotts, the bickering and the bluffing, but in the fact that the conference is based on a premise that has been overtaken by events. The premise is that hostilities can be ended by negotiation between equal parties, that compromise can be enforced by economic or even military sanctions and that Bosnia can somehow be returned to the status quo ante. The fact on the ground is that Serbia has, as the United Nations now finally admits, all but won. It has created a wilderness and called it peace. The houses are destroyed, the Muslim population is "cleansed" and the Serbian fighters control 74 per cent of Bosnia.

As Dr Radovan Karadzic, the leader of the Bosnian Serbs, points out in a letter on this page, neither Britain nor the EC has any Balkan policy. Most of Europe's foreign ministries, he says, seem to work on a combined policy of day-to-day improvisation and window dressing. All the effort to fashion a United Nations resolution on the possible use of force to bring aid to the besieged in Sarajevo and Gorazde missed the point however well-fed the inhabitants, the Serbs will bombard them until these towns fall. Any militarily enforced corridor will be subject to eternal guerrilla harassment.

Over the past week even UN officials have admitted that a diplomatic solution is now out of the question. More than 1.3 million of Bosnia's 1.6 million Muslims have been forced outside their country's borders. The Serbs are now crudely blackmailing the UN high commissioner for refugees with the ultimatum: either accept thousands more who "voluntarily" leave or force them to stay behind and watch them be slaughtered.

Two questions arise from the smoke of this grotesque but nearly complete triumph for Serbian aggression, questions that must be the basis of the London conference. First, what should be done about the refugees? Second, assuming the outside world deplores this creation of Greater Serbia, how does it propose to react to the Serbs' conquests? Douglas Hogg pounding the table in front of Slobodan Milosevic and declaring that Serbian actions were "intolerable" was, as Dr Karadzic points out, merely ridiculous. Yet the West has set its face against military intervention. No Western government will commit troops to push the Serbs back behind Bosnia's frontier. Nor are the Serbs going to withdraw.

Should the hapless Muslim refugees therefore be found new homes? They may become like Palestinians. There are parallels in the wish to keep them in camps near their homes as a way of keeping up pressure on the new occupiers. If the world condemned such exploitation of Palestinians, should it not now open its borders and offer them a new life straightaway? Otherwise, as Paddy Ashdown has warned, they will become, like Palestinians, the terrorists of tomorrow.

The realpolitik of such considerations is still too much for the West. It insists that economic sanctions should be redoubled, diplomatic pressure on Serbia stepped up, negotiation undertaken to restore the borders of Bosnia. The events of the past week have shown that these are pipedreams. Dr Karadzic, with the smug magnanimity of the victor, is now offering to take back Muslims into a Serbian Bosnian state. The Muslims and the West have little choice but to recognise the fact of war. Any conference in London, Brussels or New York - that does not do so will collapse into empty rhetoric and unenforceable resolutions. But the future will not be pleasant for Mr Milosevic's Serbia, the less so if he continues to massacre the citizens of Sarajevo. He bids to rank among the monsters of postwar European politics and his countrymen will remain pariahs as long as he and they gloat over their bloody triumphs.

THE VIRTUES OF BORROWING

The government is in danger of overspending its overdraft before the year is out. Only a third of the way through the financial year, the public sector borrowing requirement, at £11.3 billion, is almost double its level this time last year. City analysts expect the eventual figure to top £30 billion. Is this cause for alarm? No.

In a booming economy, such profligacy would be worrying. A high PSBR would increase inflationary pressure. A boom is a chance for governments to reduce or eliminate deficits by taking advantage of swollen tax revenues. In a recession tax receipts fall while government spending on social security inevitably rises. The best way to cut the PSBR is to let the economy grow again. Trying to cut the deficit at a time of recession retards growth and is thus likely to be counterproductive.

What appears to matter to most British politicians is the size of the national debt in relation to national income or GDP though largely as some totem of financial rectitude. Britain's debt to GDP ratio of 35.4 per cent at the end of 1991 was the lowest among the Group of Seven countries and the lowest in Europe, apart from Luxembourg. The ratio of government debt interest to GDP is the second lowest in the G7, after Japan, Even if Britain ran a PSBR of £30 to £40 billion a year for the next five years. (inconceivable, short of an even deeper recession than now), it would still probably meet the debt to GDP limit of 60 per centagreed to at Maastricht, which Germany. and every other ERM member apart from Luxembourg and France seem likely to fail.

Because sterling is in the exchange-rate mechanism the Chancelior cannot use monetary policy to stimulate an economy which remains firmly in recession. With flexible exchange rates, cutting the PSBR might lead to a cut in interest rates, which would assist recovery. But in the ERM interest rates are, in effect, set by the Bundesbank and fiscal puritanism does not bring any reward. Fiscal policy is the only alternative tool.

Sir Geoffrey Howe cut the PSBR in his famous 1981 Budget. But times were different then. Because the pound was floating, he could also cut interest rates by two points and allow a 20 per cent devaluation of the currency. The Treasury argues that a higher PSBR would undermine sterling. Yet the two strongest currencies in the past decade have been the dollar under Reaganomics and the mark after German unification, both economic policies involving huge public deficits. Japan at the last G7 meeting promised a fiscal stimulus of Y7 trillion, equivalent to 1.5 per cent of GDP or £9 billion extra on Britain's PSBR, in order to stimulate the economy and make the yen stronger. The Japanese make sure that their stimulus comes from one-off infrastructure construction and other temporary programmes.

In other words, there is no sense in making a shibboleth of the PSBR. The Treasury is right to want to restrict the long-term growth of public spending. It should try to cut back those items of spending that will continue to grow even when the economy recovers - for instance, public-sector wages and universal social benefits - since these lie at the root of public-sector inflation. But it should encourage one-off public investment programmes.

This means that familiar list of recovery measures: constructing railways and repairing houses, hospitals and schools while the private sector is depressed and construction contract prices are at rock-bottom. If the Crossrail or Channel Tunnel link are built in the next five years, while the economy is still depressed, they will not have to be built five years later when inflation may again be a problem. That is the way both to help the economy and control public spending at the

OFF WITH THEIR WIGS

Just as the 20th century is drawing to a close, the legal profession is considering joining it. Until recently, the process of law as immortalised by Charles Dickens in Bleak House had barely changed from then to now. Barristers and judges, resplendent in wigs and gowns, tended to be crusty creatures, unwilling to countenance miscarriages of justice in case they brought the law into disrepute and incapable of imagining any reform to their demonstrably perfect profession.

Now, with the appointment of a new Lord Chief Justice, Lord Taylor, a reputed man of the people, and a new Master of the Rolls. Lord Justice Bingham, who backed the government's ill-fated reform of the profession, a chink of modernity has appeared. Not only have the most famous victims of judicial miscarriage been released, a royal commission is sitting to help avert such miscarriages in future. Today the Lord Chancellor's department publishes a consultation document on discarding the wig. a less important matter than wrongful imprisonment of the innocent but a symbol nonetheless that the practice of the law need not be preserved as a Victorian relic.

Wigs came in at the end of the 17th century, when Charles II returned from exile in France sporting the fashionable perruque. Courtiers, politicians, bishops stopped wearing them over the next century and a half, but lawyers are still attached to theirs in 1992. The fact that they are at least contemplating relief from the itchy horsehair shows that reformers, instead of being marginalised as dangerous radicals, now have some influence in the profession.

In the old days, not so long ago, barristers who called for a British bill of rights were thought to be a little unsound of mind. Now the new Master of the Rolls himself argues vehemently for incorporation of the European Convention on Human Rights into

The Bar has a long way to go. Only recently did the Bar Council suggest that female barristers who had babies should be allowed to return to their chambers afterwards, and only then because it feared chambers might otherwise risk breaking the law. The Inns of Court remain unreformed. despite being run by unelected benchers who are chosen according to a system "which would have raised an eyebrow even in Renaissance Italy, in the words of Lord Williams, chairman of the Bar Council.

Lord Justice Bingham recognises that there is "a large body of responsible, middle-of-the-road opinion that regards the legal profession as riddled with anachronistic conventions and privileges". The reforms proposed three years ago by the Lord Chancellor, Lord Mackay, fell on stony ground, largely through the opposition of senior members of his profession. He all but abandoned them. Now he has a Lord Chief Justice and a Master of the Rolls on his side and a wind of change blowing through the Bar. Lord Mackay should now seize the opportunity to rekindle his reformist zeal across the whole spectrum of the law. He should start with the wigs.

The leader of Bosnia's Serbs states his case before London conference

From Dr Radovan Karadzic

Sir. May 1, as leader of the Bosnian Serbs, inform your readers of the spirit and aspirations with which I shall attend the peace conference opening in London on August 26.

The atmosphere of EC peace conferences, usually held in a physh, peaceful western hotel, can blind us to the fact that we are trying to address prejudices as old as the Balkans, that we are attempting to bring peace to a region washed by centuries of spilled blood. Occasionally the question of intervention, brough impractical (see Academy though impractical (as Lord Merlyn-Rees points out in his letter of August 18), crops up and interferes with the normal negotiating process.

The three leaders of Bosnia and Herzegovina — Alijah Izetbegovic of the Muslims, Mate Boban of the Croats and myself — are the unfortunate inheritors of our people's past. To ignore that is to miss the only opportunity to bring peace, and peace will not come through military intervention. Each of us understands the limitations and abilities of the others and the fact that bringing diverse and disparate groups under control is not easy; in the case of Mr Izetbegovic, it is probably impos-

We are now faced with a London conference on the brink of failure. It will not fail because I lack the desire for it to succeed but because the conference agenda is flawed. Douglas Hogg, who conceals his sophistication with skill, has become confused. As British foreign minister he thumps the table at the Croats for getting away with annexation, the Bosnian Serbs for aggression and lies and the Bosnian Muslims for refusing to negotiate. His thumping is done with great panache but is misses the point that all respon-hardly appropriate when he takes on the mande of EC negotiator. The moved from Milosevic. He no hardly appropriate when he takes on

As the ministerial pounding falls on deaf ears, it is worth reminding ourselves that the EC's mandate as mediator was granted by the warring factions themselves. The EC peace process therefore represents the goodwill of the parties involved and not just the interests of the great powers - in short, none of us is on

One of the problems is that neither Britain nor the EC, now under Britain's presidency, has any Balkan policy. Bland statements of principle have ignored the fact that most of Europe's foreign ministries seem to work on a combined policy of day-today improvisation and window dressing.

The Balkans is the last place on earth in which to try to prove that the EC is sophisticated enough to become a second global superpower, or that it can formulate a coherent foreign policy in an area that has broken all who have gone before. The differing historical interests of so many member states are bound to be an additional source of strain. The London talks can be saved, provided that the EC foreign ministers take a long, hard look at their policies.

The role in this process of Slobodar. Milosevic, president of Serbia, is non-existent, and to pursue his attendance in London as though it were a critical factor is mistaken. Claims that he is involved in the dayto-day, or even the long-term, situation in Bosnia and Herzegovina are pure fantasy.

Ignoring the fact that the position of Serbia and Montenegro is now represented by the "new Yugoslavia" longer has the authority to attend international talks; he only had it temporarily, due to last year's collapse of the federal system. For Britain to push this point is to invite certain disappointment, which I am as keen to avoid as anybody.

Refusal to formally invite the new Yugoslav president. Dobrica Cosic. and the prime minister, Milan Panic, would be churish. It is they. in the real world, who have the power and ability to represent Serbia and Montenegro on the international

Any retort by the Foreign Office that to invite Yugoslavia, which they "do not recognise", would legitimise their status, ignores the fact that the British, French, Germans, Italians, Greeks, Spanish, Portuguese and others all have functioning embassies in Belgrade, with reciprocal arrangements and fully accredited diplomats. If the EC cannot bring itself to invite the parties who have real relevance to this dispute, then the EC is unlikely to be of any help.

This may then be the right mo-ment to give the UN a chance to reassert itself as the global forum. acting in the interest of the new world order. It is a forum that is happily free of the constraints of historical territorial interest and free of mistrust, and it represents all the main religions engaged in this dispute. The Islamic powers would be happier with such a forum, and Dr Boutros Ghali would no longer have to concern himself with the dangers of one body acting in a way that the UN could not support.

However, I do not wish to see total victory: I want to see a settlement with which we can all live. Almost the only pre-condition is that this will not be in a unitary state. #### Plastic wallets for driving licences

From Mr R. J. Verge

Sir, I can understand why Mrs E. P. Wetherall (letter, August 13) suggests that the decision no longer to supply plastic wallets with full driving licences might be a case of "penny wise, pound foolish". How-ever I do not believe this to be the Last year it cost the Driver and Vehicle Licensing Agency some £280,000 to issue plastic wallets with driving licences. Because they are a very difficult item to insert into envelopes by machine, they slowed our process of dispatching licences to the public. We also received a saream of complaints suggesting that, because it was difficult to fold driving licences to fit into the wallets, the public were discarding the wallets on

Since we put the issue on to a "by request" basis at the beginning of July, requests for wallets are running at about 5 per cent of the numbers formerly issued. This represents a saving of almost £200.000 a year after account is taken of our extra staff time, postage and stationery costs needed to meet individual requests.

This will contribute directly towards keeping down the cost of driving licence fees in the future. In addition, because it has made the despatch of licences less complex, this change has reduced the time taken to return driving licences to the public by a day. We are keen to deliver this service quickly, as our customers expect.

Yours sincerely, R. J. VERGE (Head of Driving Licensing Division), Driver and Vehicle Licensing Centre, Longview Road, Swansea. August 12.

Travel with children

From Mrs Heather Yovanoff Sir. The answer to Davina Lloyd's travel nightmare of journeys by air with children (Life & Times, August 18) is quite simply for her to dispatch the children as "unaccompanied minors". They will be wonderfully looked after: the children's departure lounge at Heathrow Terminal 4 where I annually deposit my 10-year-old is festooned with free comics. books and soft drinks. Unaccompanied minors get special attention during flights, quite often receive a personal invitation to the cockpit and ilways receive a generous "goody bag" to keep them occupied.

The children could be delivered to the airport by a friend, or husband if he could be prised away from his work. Davina Lloyd could leave on an earlier flight, enjoy a trauma-free journey, and would be there to meet the children upon their arrival at destination. Magic! Yours faithfully,

Snuff and smoking From Commander J. R. Simpson,

RN (retd) Sir, Dr Luffingham (letter, August 14) is quite right. Many years ago, snuff enabled me to give up smoking for good. Those who try it will find the habit so disgusting that they will have no difficulty in giving up snuff too in two or three months' time. Yours faithfully.

Restrictions on private prosecutions under the Human Fertilisation and

From Lord Robertson of Oakridge Sir, Tom Welsh, writing on the recent restrictions on the work of journalists ("Silence of the helpless", Law Times, August 4), drew attention to the trend for us to lose our freedoms "casually and by default". Another freedom which we are in danger of losing in the same way is

private prosecutions.
In response to a question that I put to the government, the Lord Chancellor, in a written answer on December 18, 1991, listed 93 current public general Acts, five statutory instruments, and seven local and private Acts which contain one or more offences requiring the con-sent of the Director of Public be instituted. Of these 52, virtually half, have become law since 1980. It is hard to make out what criteria are used for deciding whether to require the DPP's consent. One understands the need for it where sensitive issues of public policy are involved, such as national security or relations with other countries.

Statutory sick pay From Mr James Mattison

the cause of its continuation.

Sir. Your report, "Workers take more sick days" (August 13), assumes that most people who stay away from work and claim statutory sick pay (SSP) are in fact unwell.

My experience, in my small manufacturing company employing about 50 people, is that there has been a steady increase in "sickness" since self-certification. The problem is made easier for the "sick" worker because he does not have to visit the benefit office to collect statutory sick

His employer now has to pay SSP to him every pay day so long as his certificate lasts (up to 26 weeks), and can claim back only 90 per cent. Yours faithfully.

Public service quality

From Mr George Binney

Sir, Councillor Irving (letter, August 12) condemns the government for standing in the way of local author-ties insisting on BS 5750 certification for their supplies and thereby perpetuates the illusion that BS5750 simply a guarantee that set procedures are established and documented -- equals quality.

The study my company has just completed of the implementation of total quality shows that BS5750 and ISO9000 (its international equivalent) are the wrong places to start continuously improving quality. The standards represent the bureaucracy of quality and do not guarantee that

Order of priority

From Mr Robert Jones Sir. It was with great interest that I read your report (August 13) concerning the impressive mural being constructed at Arsenal's Highbury football ground, particularly the details concerning the amplifiers which will mimic the cheering of hundreds of supporters, and lift the spirits of players and supporters alike. This achievement will bring little comfort to the totally deaf citizens mentioned by Lord Ashley of Stoke (letter, same day), or temper his unfortunate news that the hearing research project at Keele University is in imminent danger of collapse for want of £150,000; precisely the sum that will keep the Highbury crowd cheering.

Housing fit for frail elderly

From Mr Lucas Mellinger

Sir, With some experience in designing homes for the frail elderly. I would strongly challenge the concept promoted by the Joseph Rowntree Foundation ("Growing old grace-fully, together", Life & Times, August 5) whose director describes as "ludi-crous" the assumption that everyone remains fit for life and therefore concludes that building regulations should coerce house-builders, regardless of cost, to cater as a norm for the 9 per cent of the population with mobility impairment.

You, Sir, do not print The Times in excessively large letters, although a higher proportion of your readers has defective eyesight: they obtain glasses according to their need.

Moving house is not "a mania of the 1980s" as your report describes it. The mobility of the population, just as the mobility of the individual. is an indicator of health: socioeconomic or personal. It is neither possible nor desirable to enhance one mobility at the expense of the other.

Research is needed, not into how, collectively, to accommodate disabilities, but how, individually, to overcome such disabilities; not how collectively to grow old, but how individually to mature: gracefully. This is not a gift of architects or

School exam results

From the Principal of Concord College, Shrewsbury

Sir, It is disappointing that public examination results this year will be published a week later than is usual. A-level results will not be at schools until August 20 and the GCSE results will arrive on August 27.

I have always felt that results should be produced in much less time than it takes. This year the examinations started earlier, so late publication would seem to be unnecessary, especially in view of the high course-work content in GCSE and the widespread use of multiple choice papers.

I know that the universities receive the results a little in advance of schools but we face the rushed task of informing students and finalising classes before the new school year commences in early September.

Yours sincerely. A. L. MORRIS. Principal. Concord College. Acton Burnell Hall, Shrewsbury, Shropshire. August 18.

Weather watcher From Mr F. B. Roberts

Sir. For the past 12 months I have recorded the weather in these parts according to my use of an umbrelia on walking to the office each weekday morning. Of 243 days, 140 (57.6 per cent) were dry days, allowing me to leave my brolly at home: 70 (28.8 per cent) were days when it was dry while I walked but it had seemed prudent to take the precaution; and 33 (13.6 per cent) were days when it was raining.

There were eight weeks when all five days were umbrella-less; and there was never a week when there were more than two days of rain (or snow) at the time I walked. The daily decision was based on the BBC television weather forecast. tempered by noting the rise or fall of my barometer at home.

£3m grant for Irish mansion

Architecture

By Marcus Binney

THE Irish Government is to acquire Castletown House, near Dublin, and spent £3 million on repairing it and developing it as a showpiece. Though no official announcement has been made. Irish newspapers have reported the takeover will take place on January 1, 1994. Castletown, the largest of the great Irish Palladian houses, was built for William Conolly, Speaker of the Irish House of Commons, From modest beginnings Conolly amassed a vast fortune, largely through the sale of seques-tered land after the Battle of the Boyne. Designed in the reserved manner of the great Roman palazzo, Castletown has been shown to be the work of the papal architect, Alessandro Galilei, who came to England in 1716 and visited Ireland three years later. Castletown remained in the hands of the Conolly-Carew family until 1965 when all the contents were sold and the house was acquired by a speculator who obtained permission to build a large number of houses beside the great lime avenue and the quarters for the Irish Georgian Society he had estab-lished nine years before, and allowed the planning permission to lapse. By tireless fundraising, Castletown has been slowly repaired and refurnished and was vested in a foundation in 1979.

River Liffey.

Demolition loomed until two years later the Hon Desmond Guinness bravely bought the house as the head-

Mr Guinness said: "I am thrilled at the news. When the house and contents were originally sold there was not a squeak of concern from the Government."

The Irish Government's intervention is being held as a potential turning point in the fortunes of country houses in the republic. Though Ireland has, or had, an estimated 2,000 "country seats", proportionately at least equal to England, there has been little help for private owners and no equivalent of the National Trust to take over and open country houses to the public.

A change of heart is evidently borne from the recognition of the importance of country houses to tourism, and the Irish Government hopes to recoup much of the expenditure from the European Regional Development Fund.

Professor Kevin Nolan, chairman of the Castletown Foundation, added: "This is the right decision because we just have not the resources to continue maintaining and repairing this great house."

ble landowners despite efforts encouraging estate owners and gamekeepers to obey the law. The RSPB said that, Bath and Hong Kong. although only a minority of Mr C.K. Jones landowners, were involved in the practice, the problem remained widespread.

According to the society's records, a total of 27 birds of prey have been found killed in the Scottish countryside so far this year, including a hen harrier trampled underfoot and a buzzard caught in an illegal pole trap.

The statement followed a meeting between Ken Shaw, the RSPB's regional officer for East Scotland, and Andrew Dingwall-Fordyce, the SLF's chairman Grampian regional chairman. It is the first time the two organisations have publicly pledged to work together to stamp out the persecution of legally-protected bird species. Mr Shaw said: "Un-fortunately it is still the case that birds of prey are being persecuted, buzzard trees are being chopped down and birds are being shot. It is the minority, but it is still widespread and it is still unacceptable."

He said: "It is up to the landowner to create an atmosphere where that sort of behaviour is very obviously not accepted. That is now happening on many estates and we are pleased to see many gamekeepers recently arrived in Scotland whose knowledge of the environment generally is exceptional. That enlightened approach is undoubtedly helping the situation but we are not being naive. We are winning the battle but we know that illegal killing still goes Simon Fraser, director of the SLF, said: "It is a matter of long-term education. We have been trying to get it recognised that not everyone is doing this and it is very helpful that the RSPB are saying that." Mr Fraser added: "It is a bit like drink driving. It is not a thing you would be very proud of if convicted. You would not want your friends to know about it and I think that applies now to illegal poisoning and shooting." The issue had widespread publicity in 1989 when the head keeper on a sporting estate in Aberdeenshire was fined £2,500 for laying poison baits and setting illegal traps. Since then, however, there have been many other instances of poisoning on a lesser scale.

Quantock protest

Residents of a Somerset village are fighting National Trust plans to fence in a beauty spot. The trust have applied to fence a section of the Quantock Hills near Holford to stop the invasion of scrub. The intention is to encourage commoners to exercise their traditional grazing rights on the heathland in order to keep down the uncontrolled growth of scrub.

But villagers say the fence would restrict public access to the hills. They are demanding a public enquiry.

'Oliver Twist' workhouse on the market

By JOHN SHAW

THE grim workhouse where sus of 1821. Oliver Twist is reputed to have asked for more has gone on the market for between £300.000 and £500.000. The former parish work-house at Lothingland, near Lowestoft, Suffolk, is being sold as a property with potential for redevelopment, said Andrew Liddon, a partner in Aidreds estate agents, of cial needs housing. It was built as the Oulton House of Industry for £3,000 in 1765, the Victorians enthe next village, whose pub was used in David Copperfield. Local rumour had it that the workhouse inspired Oliver Twist. The building is set in eight acres and there is still an avenue of cherry trees which line the route to the graveyard at the back. He said over 800 people were buried there be-tween 1836 and 1899. The land was deconsecrated

40 years ago and only a couple of gravestones remain. The building housed Italian prisoners during the second world war and was taken over by the local health authority in 1950.

MALCOLM JOHNSON

Malcoin Charies Johnson, an assistant director of public affairs at New Scotland Yard, died on August 8 in hospital at Haywards Heath aged 54. He was born on November 11, 1937.

IN A distinguished career with the Metropolitan Police. one of Malcolm Johnson's most notable achievements was his part in setting up the national kidnap agreement.
The agreement — for a news blackout - was to keep the kidnappers from knowing that their crime had become public and to prevent the investigation from being hampered by journalists seeking immediate news of it, something which had happened during several cases, including that of Mrs Muriel Mc-Kay, wife of the News of the World's deputy chairman, and Lesley Whittle in

Staffordshire. At the start of his career, Johnson spent ten years on the North Eastern Evening Gazette in Middlesborough until joining the Central Office of Information in Manchester. In 1968, he came south to Scotland Yard and began treading the delicate line between police and the media. The former were his employers and the latter his taskinas-

two can often be strained. Apart from the legal strictures, some police officers have always been reticent to give too : much information to the press and relevision. On the other hand, the purpose of the media is to keep the public informed. It was on this tightrope that Johnson stepped so ably, persuading the police, on the one hand, that the press were not their implacable enemies and convincing a sometimes sceptical press, on the other, that police

James Elisworth Noland,

unfortunately for her the theft had already been discovered by the Cypros authorities in 1979 and reported to Byzantine scholars and museums. Cyprus sued for their return. and won, but James Noland's ruling, upheld on appeal, went much further. He laid down that the pretence of believing a cock-and-bull story on the part of the seller was no defence for the buyer of stolen antiquities. Nor would he accept a claim that a purchase made in Switzerland, with its permissive laws on title rights, limitations could not be in-

The dealer shipped the mosaics to Indianapolis, then would assist them whenever it was practicable to do so. Only two years after joining the Yard's Press Bureau, John-son became its head. The bureau is expected to have ready answers for the press and replies often have to be extracted from officers heavily engaged in the very inquiry that has prompted press interest in the first place. No mean diplomat. Johnson was usually able to satisfy both sides of his professional world.

When Sir Robert Mark became Commissioner of the Metropolitan Police in 1972. he decreed that instead of telling the media as little as it was possible to get away with, police should instead withhold only that which was absolutely necessary.

Johnson, as head of the press bureau, was the cutting edge of the new policy and his personable approach, his innate decency, and above all, his professional and personal integrity, helped to secure confidence in the new policy. Its greatest test came at the Balcombe Street siege when, to the dismay of senior officers, Mark, frequently aided by Johnson, briefed the press daily, often revealing more information than was thought wise. But Mark put the press on their honour not to reveal anything that might be damaging. It was a trust that was

The present openness between Scotland Yard and the media is acknowledged as one of the finest examples of its kind anywhere in the world. Sir Robert Mark may have been the architect but Johnson was undoubtedly one of the master builders. After a gruelling seven years in charge of the press bureau. Johnson took over the news group before becoming head of news in 1979, responsible for overseeing the output of information to the nation's newspapers and television stations. During this time, he founded the National Conference of Police, Press and Public Relations Officers, and was its first chairman until policy dictated that he be replaced by a senior police officer: he remained vice-chairman until his death. His last post, assistant director of public affairs, made him responsible for news of all territorial operations in the Metropolitan Police. Johnson was an eminently likeable man whose integrity and professionalism were respected throughout the Metropolitan Police.

He leaves a widow, Brenda and one daughter.

JAMES NOLAND

a US federal judge whose landmark decision in a case involving Byzantine mosaics taken from Cyprus did much to clean up the racket in stolen antiquities, died on August 12 in Indianapolis aged 72. He was born in LaGrange, Missouri, on April 22, 1920.

THERE was a whiff of the Indiana Jones movies about the case that landed in front of James Noland's Indianapolis court in 1989. Four rare sixthcentury mosaics, each about two-foot square, had been taken from the ceiling of 2 Greek Orthodox church in Lythrankomi Cyprus after the Turkish invasion of the island in 1974. The mosaics found their way to Munich. and thence to Geneva, where an Indianapolis art dealer bought them for $1.08 million from a Turkish importer. She was told, she claimed, that they had been "found" in an "extinct" church by "an archaeologist from Turkey assigned to Northern Cyprus".

tried to sell them to the Getty Museum for $20 million, but sons.

was automatically legal. Finally, he held that the statute of voked just because a stolen art work had been hidden away for years.

The effect of Noland's decision was to send a clear warning to collectors and museums that they had better make very careful checks about the provenance of artifacts offered for sale. It may not have stopped the pillage of valuable antiquities, but it put a sizable dent in the trade. He was a Democratic congressman and was appointed to the federal bench by President Lyndon Johnson in 1966. He is survived by his wife and two

THE VERY REV J. H. S. WILD

The Very Rev J. H. S. Wild, Master of University College. Oxford, 1945-51, and Dean of Durham, 1951-73, died on August 15 at home aged 87. He was born on December 22, 1904...

JOHN Herbert Severn Wild was a striking example of an Oxford don who, without any special academic distinction, rose rapidly to the headship of a great society by the quiet competence with which he discharged his manifold college duties. A thorough and conscientious administrator, he played a no less useful role in the affairs of the Church, and his counsel was widely sought and valued. From beginning to end he identified nimself, as a churchman, with movements which aimed at bringing Christian principles down to the plane of practical reality.

There have been Deans of Durham with greater academic distinction and more striking gifts of personal leadership. The period of Wild's tenure, however, demanded precisely those gifts of personal friendship and wise and careful administration with which he was so richly endowed.

J. H. S. Wild was the eldest son of the Rev Herbert Louis Wild, who had been viceprincipal of St Edmund Hall, Oxford, and who subsequently became Archdeacon of Nottingham and later, Bishop of Newcastle.

As a boy Wild went from Summer Fields School to Clifton, where he was a scholar: he also obtained his cap for Rugby Football From Clifton he proceeded to Brasnose College, Oxford, as a classical scholar, and there took a first in honour moderations, a third in greats and a second in theology. He represented Oxford in athletics in 1927. After a year at Westcott House, Cambridge, he was admitted to the diaconate in 1929 and was ordained priest in 1930. The first four years of Wild's industrial parish of St Aidan, most considerate and ap-Newcastle-on-Tyne: his close proachable of heads. His contact there with the life of the workers and the problem of unemployment left a deep imprint on his attitude towards such social issues. In 1933 he returned to Oxford as Chaplain Fellow of University College, and was soon made Praelector in Theology and Domestic Bursar: from the beginning of the second world war he held the office of Dean. From 1942, when the Master, Sir William (later Lord) Beveridge, was occupied with the preparation of the report given his name which provided the basis of the welfare state. Wild acted as Vice-Master of the college. Then in 1945, when Beveridge had announced his intention of standing for parliament and in consequence of grasp of the internal life of the college was remarkable and extended to the smallest detail. Outside the university he gave his main attention to Christian work. Although he was never an eloquent preacher. his sincere faith and his patent determination to give it practical expression endeared him to great numbers of people. The son of an Evangelical father, he was himself a strong central churchman, with a slight leaning to the piety of the Tractarian movement. He was examining chaplain to the Bishops of Lichfield, Guildford and Blackburn, and commissary to the Bishop of Colombo. Among the many enterprises of social betterment in which he threw his energies was the scheme for body elected Wild Master. camps for the unemployed in Wild showed himself the the year before the war: he

At Durham there was ample scope for an administrator of his particular type. The former, seemingly impregnable financial position of the dean and chapter had been replaced by a period in which consolidation and even retrenchment were required. Many important improvements were effected in the internal furnishings and arrangements of the cathedral, however, and he compiled a new guidebook which was both popular and scholarly. In addition to the cathedral itself, the Dean and Chapter of Durham are responsible for a considerable estate and, as governors, for two important schools. The repair of Prebends' Bridge, a historic link between the peninsula and the surrounding country, became urgent, and the successful completion of a public appeal for funds occupied much of his time and energy. A thorough reconstruction of the Chapter estates, largely necessitated by the inevitable neglect of the war years, was carried through under his leadership and he gave unstitted attention to the problem of reconciling the many commitments of the Chapter with the interest of solvency. The enlargement and reorganisation of the Choristers' School, planned by his predecessor, was efficiently carried out during the early years of his tenure of the record of unobtrusive public service. He had a keen interest love of natural beauty made him a zealous defender of the amenities of the city.

YOUR splendid and full obituary of Dr Mary McHugh (August 11) which correctly showed her as a somewhat obstinate and wilful "mistress of discourtesy" (Lord Justice Warkins) with a somewhat restless outlook - perhaps causing the storms which sometimes buffeted her. All quite true. But there was a different side to her which should be acknowledged.

I was company director of a business in Old Kent Road, Peckham, for 20 years, serving the same public who were her patients in her medical practice. Her hard work and care brought out great trust and affection between doctor and patients far beyond her medical duties. She was mother confessor to many, her surgery always open to hear the trials and troubles of life.

Lord Cheshire

IN JULY 1990, Leonard Cheshire (obituary, August 3) went to Berlin to attend a rock concert staged on Potsdamer Platz in support of one of his last humanitarian projects: the Memorial Fund For Disaster Relief. The fund sought a donation equal to £5.00 for each one of the estimated dead of two world wars. The interest earned from this bed of capital would then be used for emergency disaster relief, although the capital itself would remain untouched

Whilst he was in Berlin

Lord Cheshire agreed to speak to me for British Forces Broadcasting Service about the project. When we met, his humility and dedication to helping others came shining through. He linked the future prospect of saving lives with the recognition of the debt owed to the men and women who gave theirs in the name of liberty, by describing the phi-losophy of the fund as "a life for a life". He also spoke of his negotiations with Washington and Moscow for the casings of scrapped Pershing and SS missiles to raise money by turning the metal into pens (pens being mightier, etc). Lord Cheshire also showed a keen sense of humour: when I arrived at the hotel to record the interview, the receptionist had no record of a "Mr Cheshire" in the register. Recalling his war-time career, however, and cross-referencing with what I knew to be his room number, we soon established that a "Mr Lancaster" was a guest, and was expecting a visitor!

IT HAS been said that when Buckingham Palace was damaged by air attacks during the war, Queen Elizabeth said that, now that her home had also been damaged, she felt she could look the people of the East End in the face.

Some months ago Leonard Cheshire was diagnosed as suffering from motor neurone disease. His only comment seems to have been that he felt he could now, as at last one of themselves, empathise with the disabled.

Tommy Nutter, fashion setting tailor, ied of an Aids related illness o August 17 aged 49. He was born on April 17, 1943.

IN 1969, when many bespoke tailors practiced their trade in discreet premises and still had names that sounded more like firms of solicitors, the opening up of an actual shop with a plate-glass frontage and the name Tommy Nutter above it in Savile Row was a distinct break with tradition. At the age of 26 Tommy Nutter was not old enough to be encumbered with venerated notions of bespoke tailor-ing and his "total look" styles — with pinstripes cut on the horizontal, gamekeeper's tweeds mixed at random in a three-piece suit and wide lapels and flared trousers - provoked predictable tut-tuts from traditionalists. But although he set about revising the public image of Savile Row as a place of white-haired old men creaking over their tape-measures - his head cutter was only 28 and none of the staff over the 30 - Nutter had a healthy respect for the craftsmanship of bespoke tailoring; he boasted that he used only the best in both materials and cutters and favoured English cloth and the classic English suit, "but with a little more design and much more colour".

Along with hairdresser Vidal Sassoon, photographer David Bailey and models Twiggy and Jean Shrimpton, Tommy Nutter became a trend-setter of the time. John Lennon was an early client (Nutter made the white suits he and Yoko wore); three of the Beatles wore his suits for the famous photograph of them walking across a zebra crossing for the cover of the Abbey Road album (George Harrison preferring denim jeans); and other cus-tomers ranged from the Duke of Bedford and Lord and Lady Harlech to Mick and

Bianca Jagger. The son of an upholsterer, Tommy Nutter failed his 11-plus, was educated at Camrose secondary school in Edgware and then studied plumbing at Willesden Technical College. He worked for a boilding firm at 15 and then saw an advertisment for a pin boy in a tailor's in Savile Row. He joined Donaldson, Williams & Ward, a traditional tailoring company situated in the Burlington

Arcade, around the corner from Savile Row and studied at the Tailor and Cutter Academy. At the same time he started hanging around the trendy clubs of Swinging Sixties London. Among the celebrities he met was the singer Cilla Black who helped finance him when he decided to set up his own tailoring business. Over the following eight years Nutter's flair and expertise ensured his success. A host of Sixties celebrities sought out his designs and in 1971, along with Hardy Amies (who became one of his customers) and Lord Snowdon, he was featured on a Best Dressed Men's List in America.

Nutter enjoyed dressing his more adventurous customers like Sir Roy Strong, Mick Jagger or Elton John. "That's when I can go a bit silly," he would have strangled the wearer. Baggywaisted trousers narrowed to the regulation "break" on the instep of natty halfbrogues or co-respondent shoes. But the finished Nutter creation was likely to look just as exaggerated in reality and twice as dashing. This stream of letters to fashion editors expressed his enthusiasm for tailoring and correct style and was a natural extension of his own self-deprecat-

To compliment his bespoke service, Nutter offered ready-to-wear designs. Although he experienced some financial difficulties in the early 1970s, in 1978 he launched his first major ready-to-wear collection for the Austin Reed stores and in 1980 he was signed for five years by a Japanese conglomerate, Daido Worsted Mills and the Milliontex Corporation, for which he designed two cloth collections a year, also designing two menswear collections for a leading Japanese store, Hankyu. After more than 20 years in Savile Row.

Tommy Nutter was still doing imaginative things with chalk-stripes and window pane checks for Lord Montagu, Sir Roy Strong and the more fashion-conscious businessmen, and piping white satin in gold for Elton John. Sir Roy Strong believed that Nutter's designs encapsulated the concepts of dressing in the 1980s and in 1983, at Sir Roy's request, one of Nutter's suits — a grey horizontal chalk stripe — was donated to the costume department of the Victoria and Albert Museum. On display at the Bath Museum of Costume is Nutter's revivial of the frock coat, and a three-piece suit showing his use of mixing checks is housed at the Los Angeles Museum of Art.

In 1989 he created the costumes for Jack Nicholson's performance as the Joker in the Batman film; he also designed a pearl grey suit for Bill Wyman when the Rolling Stone married his teenage bride Mandy Smith. Nutter was an enthusiastic letter writer to The Times, detailing in one the correct number of buttons to be done-up, depending on whether a suit is double or single-breasted. In his final years, knowing that he was suffering from Aids, he participated actively in Aids-related chari-

EXECUTION IN YORK CASTLE

Yesterday morning, at 8 o'clock, the first private execution was performed in York Castle, when William Jackson suffered the last sentence of the law for the murder of his sister, at Kirklington. a village near Ripon. At 1 o'clock on Tuesday morning the convict sounded the bell for the Governor (Captain Lowrie), who immediately went to him, when he at once said, I am guilty of the murder of my sister." He then made the following confession:-

"I went to Bedale at 9 o'clock in the morning of the 5th of May. My sister told me I was to come back at 3 o'clock in the afternoon, and then I should get my tea, and she would set me to Kirklington. When we got to Kirklington Church, I told her she had better go back again, as it was gening rather late. She said, 'No; I'll go a little further yet. She went with me till we got the other side of the barn field. She then wanted to go with me altogether. I said, 'No, it's no use your talking. Lizzie; you shan't go with me, not at present. But I said she could come to me when I got work. She said, 'No, I will go with you now, for when you get away you'll never write any more. So I told her, 'Yes, I will: you needn't fear,' but she said, 'No. I'll so with thee; for I know what thou is when thou gets away, So I said, Good night to her. She commenced crying when I shook hands to part with her. So when I shook hands with

as ever i could, she ran after me. Two men passed us while this was taking place. When she got up to me I turned round and said, 'Now, Lizzie, you had better go back.' She says to me, 'I will not go back: wherever thou goes I'll go with thee.' So I mad more to do. I opened my black bag and took out my razor and cut my sister Lizzie's throat. She screamed out when the blood flew out. She dropped on the footpath and I lifted her off. She muttered, 'Oh, Will,' I think, and then I ran away. I am very sorry for not confessing this great sin before.

Pine beauty moths wipe out Isle of Lewis forest

By Kerry Gill

PINE beauty moths have devastated 600 hectares of trees planted by the Forestry Commission on the isle of Lewis in the Outer Hebrides. It is the first time that the moths' voracious appetite has destroyed lodgepole pines so far west. Damage was put yesterday at more than £1 million.

Defoliation; which took place when the moths were in their caterpillar stage, is thought to have been so extensive that the plantations, established nearly 20 years ago, are unlikely to recover.

denuded of needles. All that remain are rows of dead, brown wood. In places where a passer-by believes he can still see greenery, it is simply scores of caterpillars almost bursting with food on a dying branch. Last night Forestry Commission officials held one of a series of public meetings on Lewis to show people how to identify the pupae in the hope that further destruction can be making them infertile, so that they die off," said Rod Johnstone, district manager for Forest Enterprise, the commercial arm of the commission. By next spring it will be known whether the spraying has worked. Since 1976 the moth, a

unflushed peat sites in Scotland are the only places in which pine beauty outbreaks have begun, although lodgepole pine trees growing in most other soil types have subsequently been defoliated". The reason is that the pupae survive better over winter in peat sites because of the enhanced humidity.

The natural enemies of the pine beauty moths include certain beetles and small mammals. Dr Leather said that more planting of Scots pines, largely unaffected by the moths, helped because they encouraged pine beauty predators. He has published guidelines to minimise the risk of damage, including an avoidance of planting purely lodgepole pines, planting mixed trees such as Scots pines, other conifers and broadleaved trees and encouraging habitats suitable for small mammals. Even if the devastated trees on Lewis do not show any new growth there are no plans to cut them down. The commission may begin planting broad leaved trees and Scots pine among the dead wood which will act as a wind shelter. The introduction of different species could save future generations of lodgepines from the ravages of the pine beauty moths.

Older students outnumber school-leavers on campus

By JOHN O'LEARY, EDUCATION CORRESPONDENT

THERE are more mature students than 18-year-olds on British campuses for the first time, the education department announced yesterday.

Older entrants have fuelled the rapid growth in higher education over the past decade, many studying part-time without grants. The numbers starting courses when at least 21 rose by 77 per cent during the 1980s.

Although the number of 18-year-olds has continued to rise, those returning to education are in the majority. While universities remain dominated by school-leavers, the more numerous part-time courses in polytechnics and colleges have tipped the bal-ance towards older students.

Major-General Anatoli Krayushkin of the security ministry's directorate told a news conference that Stalin's secret police had listed foreign prisoners in their secret archives, now under examination following the collapse of the Soviet Union. He said: "Overall, the number of people who suffered from the purges is significantly higher than has been revealed."

Itar-Tass news agency said Maj Gen Krayushkin was speaking after handing over to an Austrian embassy representative a list of more than 200 Austrian prisoners, that had been put together from the files of the once-dreaded

Statistics show that a 10 per cent increase in mature students enrolling in 1990 allowed the old to overtake the young for the first time. Almost 237,000 started highpared with 134,000 in 1980. A further 38,000 joined the Open University.

The trend is certain to continue as the number of 18year-olds declines. Almost all school-leavers qualified for degree courses go on to higher education.

A drift back to education among those in their twenties has been accelerated by the recession. Many who went into jobs at 16 or 17 are taking the opportunity to adjust to a more demanding employment market by improving their qualifications.

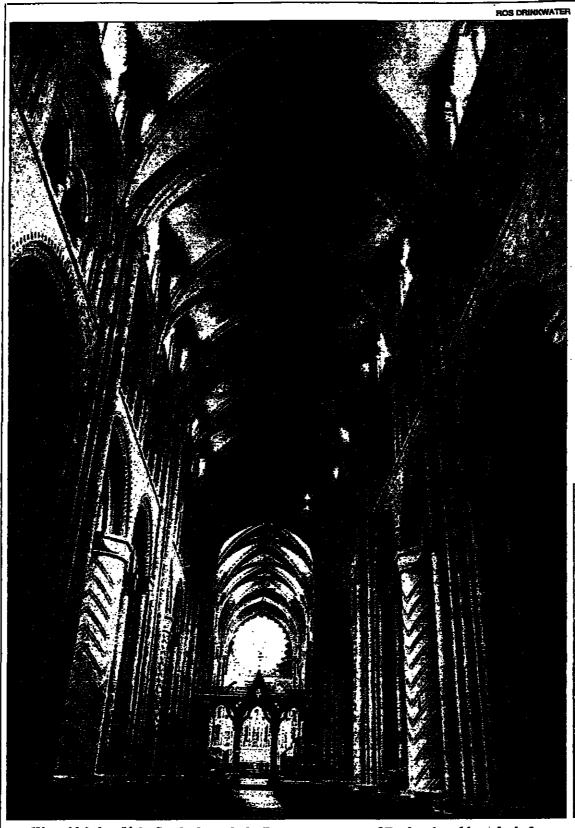

Nigel Forman, the higher education minister, said that more than 250,000 mature students were entering higher education. "This demon-strates that universities, polytechnics and colleges have responded positively to increasing demand for places in higher education from older students. This increase reflects a significant change in the pattern of student participation which is likely to be sustained."

Just over a third of mature students joined full-time courses in 1990. Almost half were women. Four out of five starting courses over the age of 20 were in polytechnics or colleges, more than half taking courses below degree level. The majority taking degree courses were over 25.

Business studies was the most popular subject in 1990, especially for part-time students. Social sciences, education and engineering recruited many older students.

The total first-year entry to higher education courses grew from 315,000 in 1980 to more than 468,000 a decade later. John Major has set a target of one in three school-leavers to enter higher education by 2,000.

900 events to mark Durham's 900 years

BY PAUL WILKINSON

Durham Cathedral, internationally acknowledged as one of the world's finest examples of Romanesque architecture, will celebrate its 900th anniversary next year with a summer-long programme of events.

Announcing the festivities yesterday, the Very Rev John Arnold, the dean, said they wanted to use the occasion for the community's benefit and hoped it would generate much needed tourist revenue for a region where unemployment is running at 12.4 per cent.

The cathedral and the ajoining Durham Castle top a rocky promon-tory on a bend in the River Wear. Their dominating position over-looking the old city has been designated a world heritage site by Unesco and is the biggest visitor venue in the North-east. Last year it attracted about 600,000 visitors and the Northumbria Tourist Board believes the anniversary will bring at least another 100,000 into the region.

The list of events includes a visit by Dr George Carey, Archbishop of Canterbury, once a parish priest in the city, as well as rock and classical concerts and drama and art

Durham County council, which is putting up about £130,000 for the programme, is promising 900 events throughout the county in what Don Robson, its leader, calls "a move to link the entire community with this great church". He added: "We want schools to be involved, local organisations, everyone on the region. We want to invite the church into our schools and we want the community to go into the church."

Fish king r for the

I c added: "How many people who see this magnificent building every time they look up really know what goes on here? This will be a people's celebration, not a building's celebration."

The programme will begin on March 20 with a service attended by Dr Carey to honour the memory of St Cuthbert, the seventh-century monk and Bishop of Lindisfarres whose hody lies are bringed behind whose body lies enshrined behind the high altar.

Fischer king moves for the grail

champion, is poised to reassert his dominance, Raymond Keene predicts in the arena of mental sports. In Canterbury, 300 people have competed in the European Championship of the venerable Japanese game of Go; in London, computers have fought out their very own Olympic Games, while, also in London, this week, Marion Tinsley, the world draughts champion, is being challenged for his title by a machine. Now, as the culmination, the greatest mind warrior in history is on the warpath again. Bobby Fischer, the reclusive and controversial American chess genius, has armounced his comeback Regarded by many as the most brilliant and incisive chess mind in history, Fischer will play for a record $5 million (£2.6 million) against Boris Spassky, his old rival, in two no less controversial venues in the former state of Yugoslavia. Their match, set to start on September 1, has sent the chess world, as well as those fascinated by the mind-bending eccentricity of the game's most superb practitioner. into frenzies of anticipation.

Twenty years ago this month. Fischer swept to victory, to be crowned as the eleventh world champion, against the self-same Spassky. That memorable event was staged in Reykjavik, Iceland, and was traught with threats to withdraw, arcane protests and political overtones. By winning, Fischer decame the first American world chess champion and was immediately swamped with proposals, any one of which would have made him a millionaire many

In the two decades since that 1972 confrontation, Fischer has infuriated the chess world by his refusal to contest even one game in a public forum. After his victory he became increasingly reclusive, a prey to religious eccentrics and was associated with the Worldwide Church of God.

But now Fischer has announced that he is to contest a self-styled "World Chess Championship" against his old rival, Spassky. The promoter is Jezdimir Vasiljevic, proprietor of Jugoskandik, a Belgrade bank. The contest will begin in the villa once belonging to President Tito on the Montenegran island of Sveti Stefan. Tito's former villa has been transformed into the luxury Hotel Maestral. The second half of the match will be played in Belgrade, where Fischer is currently living in the bodyguard-surrounded residence Prince Tomislav, a member of the Serbian ruling

Spassky, world champion from 1969 to 1972, has confirmed the news. Yes, Bobby and I have signed a contract to contest the World Chess Championship match." To this, he added: "Fischer his August has been a pulls me out of oblivion. He makes month of unusual activity me fight. It is a miracle, and I'm me fight. It is a miracle, and I'm grateful." The match will continue until one player wins ten games, with the winner receiving $3.35 million and the loser $1.65 million. The prize exceeds by one million dollars the prize for the official world championship between Gary Kasparov and either Holland's Jan Timman or England's Nigel Short, set for Los Angeles next

Kasparov, the world champion, has dismissively described the $5 million prize fund for the Belgrade match as "the highest sum ever earned by two retired champions". But Mr Vasiljevic, who is putting up the money has dramatically raised the stakes by throwing down a golden gauntlet to Kasparov himself. This amounts to a staggermg $500,000 per game if Kasparov also consents to play Fischer. Kasparov has not yet reacted to this fresh

Fischer was a brash, unschooled young man from Brooklyn, who toppled the might of the Soviet chess system before his thirtieth hirthday. His story provided the inspiration for the Tim Rice/Abba musical Chess in 1986. But the dream evaporated after he took the world title from Spassky in 1972. Inexplicably, at that moment, he renounced chess totally.

Fischer's 1972 match against Spassky was characterised by the American's minutely det mands, and his near-refusal to play before the match was even under way. Spassky had never previously lost to his antagonist, and the Russian's meticulous pre-match preparation, both mental and physical, was well known. He enjoyed playing tennis to keep fit, and in Reykjavík he was additionally supported by a host of sports psychologists and seconds. Spassky won the first game, and was awarded by the second by default, when Fischer failed to put in an appearance at the board. But once Fischer condescended to play, he unleashed a psychological blitzkreig, protesting about the presence of televison cameras, the playing conditions and the board. He demanded the exclusive use of his hotel swimming pool, and insisted that the official board be reduced in size by precisely three millimetres. In retaliation, the Soviet delegation declared that Spassky was being distracted by claudestine electronic equipment. They demanded a complete search of the playing hall, an X-ray of the chairs, but this only revealed two dead flies. The circus ended with Fischer taking the title by the score of 122 points to 82 with some of the most profound and innovative top-level chess ever witnessed. The first book on the match appeared in print within 24 hours of its close sold 300,000 copies within a

Inevitably, the superpower clash became overladen with a Cold War symbolism, which attracted the glare of the world media. Perhaps the Western press exposure, to which Spassky was quite unaccustomed, helped to knock the stuffing out of him. After 1972, he suffered a permanent decline in morale, and his reputation was rapidly eclipsed by younger compatriots, Kasparov and Anatoly Karpov.

aradoxically, the 1972 match exerted an even more disastrous impact on its victor. In 1975, after lengthy wrangling, much of it FIDE, the World Chess Federation, stripped Fischer of his title when he refused to defend against the new challenger, Karpov. Fischer thus earned the dubious distinction of becoming the only player in the history of world championship chess to have lost his title by default. Fischer's subsequent self-imposed exile angered and exasperated chess enthusiasts and the general public

Fischer saw no necessity to prove himself as world champion again. By total and sudden withdrawal from the arena, at the absolute height of his powers, he preserved a mythical nimbus of invincibility. But the world passed him by, an isolated figure on his lonely summit, while attention shifted towards Karpov, Kasparov, Timman and

Yet it transpired that Fischer's endless demands, with their attendant upsurge of publicity for chess, acted as a catalyst in improving the lot of the professional chess player and vasily increasing the prize money. Fischer endowed the game

Now, finally, Fischer appears ready, once again, to face the world. Interestingly, the conditions for this new contest are those he demanded, but which the World Chess Federation rejected, for the 1975 match against Karpov which never took place. This match will continue until one player wins ten games. The remaining match conditions

mirror Fischer's own

There wall be tive week, every game played to a finish. with no possibility of adjourning. This reflects Fischer's fear that if a game is adjourned overnight his opponent may enlist the aid of a computer to pinpoint the correct line. Furthermore, the match games will be timed by a special chess clock which Fischer has personally developed and patented. At the commencement of each game, both players will have a reserve of 90 minutes on this clock. Each time one player makes a move, he will gain two minutes. In theory, this device (based on Japanese timing in their national mind games of Shogi and Go) should eliminate the wild time scrambles ern chess. The common theme behind all Fischer's innovations and rule changes seems to be to eliminate what he sees as the elements of chance. In this match pure talent will triumph, and Fischer sees himself as the embodiment of genius and talent over training and rougine.

One element in Fischer's return has been a desire to enrage the world establishment by playing in Serbia. The match is likely to be viewed as violating the international sanctions imposed by the UN. and two weeks ago the US Senate started to examine the question. Nations in disfavour with the world community exert a strange fascination over Fischer. In former years, the only offers which seriously attracted him were those to play in South Africa. Mr Vasiljevic, expanding enthusiastically on this theme, rammed the point home. By bringing Fischer to Yugoslavia, we have broken the international blockade in a most spectacular manner. We practically had to abduct Fischer from the autoort in Budadest because were afraid they might take his passport and ban him from enter-

The former champion may also have something personal to prove. He has a fiancée, the 19-year-old Hungarian chess master. Zita Rajesaniy, born in 1973, a year after he beat Spassky in Reykjavik. Miss Rajcsaniy has a chess rating of 2100 on the World Chess Federation scale, which pushes her well into the upper echelons of female players. If Fischer can revive the old sparkle, this will be a memorable match. I predict that if he can shake off the rust of 20 years of inaction over the first four games or so, he will go on to win. He is still "hungry" in modern athletic terminology, and he has a lot to prove. Spassky, too, can rise to the occasion. The fresh challenge from his ancient foe may reawaken his creative passion. If Fischer loses badly over the initial stretch, he may just stop or withdraw. But if he emerges victorious, after a well fought struggle, as I believe he wil he may go on to a fresh and glorious challenge against Kasparov. More frustratingly, though, Achilles may return to sulk in his Pasadena tent for a further two decades, while consoling himself with the thought that he is $3 million the richer.

The changing concept of beauty in art through the ages

Since you ask, I'm wearing my old Hoover bag

California recently phoned me at great expense from a Santa Barbara call-box and asked me what clothes I had on Not having read any fashionable American novels about sex-by-phone, I found this rather unsettling. It came out of the blue. I mean, we observed the usual preliminary greetings, such as "What time is it where you are?" and "Have you seen The Player yet, isn't it great?".

But we had barely touched on the elections and the earthquake forecasts before he posed this extraordinary question about my attire, leaving me all perplexed and wrong-footed.

Was this a dirty phone-call, I thought, or was he simply concerned to conjure up an innocent mental picture of his faraway pai? Should I give him the benefit of the doubt? Playing for time (and angling for cines) I asked what he was wearing, but his answer didn't help. Evidently his outfit consisted of a T-shirt and trousers, some trainers and a beany-hat. "Sounds very nice." I said non-commitally. wondering whether the beany-hat was a code for something. Either way. I was still completely in the dark about whether to confess to the old grey army socks and the jumbo dungarees.

Fran Lebowitz once said that the telephone is a good way to talk to people without having to offer them a drink: Personally, I see it as a good, way of talking to people without having to dress up in a high-cut Kim Basinger costume, or apologise for your paltry wardrobe of seductive gear. In the end, I decided to ignore the overtones, and acted dumb. I said that actually my dothes were so thickly matted with cat-hair and household fluff that I could no longer identify them with any confidence. A smart evasion, which seemed to do the trick, because the subject. turned to the Richter scale forth-

I was more disturbed by this conversation than it really merited, perhaps. But I hold the telephone in reverence as an instrument of pure verbal communication, and I don't like to see it messed about Surely this is the only form of talk in which you can convince yourself that the other person is really engaged in a flow of words entirely undistracted by the extraneous. Which is precisely why it always comes as a shock to discover that for the past ten minutes the other person has been keeping an eye on Northern Exposure, or marking exams, fitting a new flea-collar on a

An old tumbler simply rolls on

ohnny Hutch is remembering.

"Once you can do a flip-flap', my old guv nor told me, 'You'll never be short of a pound.' And he was so right."

Hutch was 14 when he heeded this sage advice. Sixty-five years later he does few flip-flaps himself, but he still. stays busy passing on the art of acrobatic comedy. "I could work every day of the week, but I try to keep a little time for myself. I have sometimes thought", he adds, with utter lack of conviction considering that his eightieth birthday is just around the corner. "that I might retire when I'm eighty."

He is known to television viewers across the world as the little old man who gets slapped or patted on the head in Benny Hill shows, he was working with Hill on a new series when the comedian died in April. He runs his own comedy acrobatic troupe, The Nitwits, which early this year embarked on an eight-month tour of American circus.

Hutch conducts workshops in comedy at Circus Space, and develops acrobatic routines for modern dance groups such as The Kosh. His life and work was the inspiration behind Endangered Species. The Kosh's current touring production about a struggling music hall double act, which Hutch co-directed and co-choreographed. He also taught Robert Dow-ney Jr to do comedy falls for the actor's role as Charlie Chaplin in Richard Attenborough's forthcoming film Chaplin. And later this month. Hutch takes part in the International Workshop Festival, leading a weekend workshop on vaudeville and acrobatic routines on August 29 and 30. Hutch is not much over five feet tall, but ram-rod straight and dapper. He still moves like quicksilver and talks at a pace, with the unreformed accent of his native Middlesbrough, where he grew up the son of a stevedore.

'My mother was a singer, my father clog-danced and my brothers did acrobatics; and we used to go round working men's clubs on Saturdays and Sundays. I was thin and wiry and a very good contortionist. They used to call me the double jointed kid. My father developed a routine for me when I was I I or I 2, doing acrobatic bends with a pickaxe and a shovel and a barrow - things that were familiar to the working men.

"Just when I left school at 14, a troupe of Arab acrobats came to Middlesbrough. The week before, the prentice boy had fallen off the top of an Arab pyramid and broken his arm, so they advertised in the Middlesbrough Gazette for a small boy to stand on top of the human pyramid.

So I went to the Middlesbrough Empire with my mother, along with 20 other little urchins. When they saw me bend and such they said, 'Can we take him, Missus? and she said, 'Oh, yes'. They gave me a contract for five years half a crown a week pocket money, all my dothes and all my keep. That was in 1926."

utch served his apprenticeship as an Arab tumbler. working with the Seven Royal Hindustans until 1937, touring the great Continental music halls. "After the war I put on my own troupes - The Seven Volunts, the Six Herculeans, Johnny Hutch and the Halfwits, The Rapid Four, The Two Warner Brothers. You had to do everything impressions, dance, acrobatics, character, dialects.

In those days there were 52 weeks work a year for any good variety act. You could play six months in London alone - the Palladium, the Canterbury, the Metropolitan, Hackney Empire, Lewisham Hippodrome, New Cross Empire – grand theatres. From 1927 to 1937 it was paradise in our business - reserved compartments on the trains, two-thirds fare concessions. I played with all the great artists, and later with the big Americans." He watched the music halls die in the 1950s. "The theatres took a dive, and so they introduced nudes. The girls then had to stand perfectly still or they

France, Spain, Sweden, South Africa. And when I finished with circus, I went into big cabarets, the Lido, the Folies Bergères, Las Vegas, And pantomime every year at the Palladium."

At 64, Johnny won the World Circus Championship, performing the rare feat of "a round-O flip-flap, fulltwisting back somersault. That was the last time though. A lot of people make old age an excuse to be lazy, and that's

DANCE REVIEW

Strange sort of homage

HOW good is your imagination? Unless it is in lively working order, you may have difficulty convincing yourself that English National Ballet's programme this week is a worthy tribute to this century's first master choreographer, or perhaps even understanding how Fokine won his reputation.

The company was fielding several ubstitutes on Monday night, but the trouble began long before the intended casts began to fall like ninepins. To put on a corny old melodrama such as Shéhérazade is asking for trouble, but in the past Bakst's amazing decor has made it bearable. ENB owns a good reproduction (by Geoffrey Guy) of the setting but at the Festival Hall you cannot see the marvellously rich, clashing colours. This became obvious last year, so why repeat the mistake?

A lack of conviction in the way the dancers performed their insipid harem orgy is understandable. Carlos Acosta had his dramatic moments as the Golden Slave, but kept deflating them by casting the audience looks that only too clearly asked "wasn't I clever?".

Le Spectre de la Rose has a better theme (a girl's reverie after her first ball) and better choreography, but there is a little problem: the title part. created around Nijinsky's ambiguous but compelling personality, is almost unperformable. I have seen many celebrated dancers try, one or two decent near-misses, but only two complete successes: both of them, John Gilpin and Rudolf Nureyev, with this company years ago.

brought forward to replace an absent colleague, struggled bravely to get through the steps; who can blame him if bravura and smoothness eluded him. or any sense of controlling Renata

The Dying Swan is another piece that has for some time been something of a dead duck. For Anna Pavlova to have made this sentimental little number impress audiences so much is evidence of what a great performer she must have been. Fragments of film suggest that she danced it with a tough centre, but some may prefer the breathless earnestness which Ludmila Semenyaka gave it here.

tion, was the best of the evening, with Agnes Oaks catching the spirit and the lightness of the mazurka and duet, and Maria Teresa Del Real accurate in the prelude solo. Tim Almaas danced confidently, if none too powerfully or elegantly. Orchestrated Chopin is not to all tastes but the orchestra played this best of the evening's works. The Fokine ballet which might particularly suit the present dancers is Carnaval — which this company has never done. But the programme book reminds us that 14 years ago the ENB did give Les Sylphides with Petrushka and the Polovisian dances from Prince Igor. Now that might have been more like a tribute.

PROMS REVIEW

Ancient and justified

THERE have been times, over the decades, when custom has been known to stale the infinite variety of the Academy of Ancient Music, Monday, night, though, was not one of linen. With scarcely a standing inch left in either arena or gallery. Christopher Hogwood justified the clearly high hopes of the Promenaders.

e glory must be Hogwood's band was joined for this all-Bach programme by the scarletgowned Choir of New College, Oxford. Edward Higginbottom conducted them alone, save for the presence of three dimly-lit continuo players, in the evening's sober centrepiece, the funeral motet "Komm, Jesu, komm".

There was something very English about the vocal rhythms which barely touched the ground, the light enuncia tion, the wide-eyed and wide-throated celebration of Leben always as "Layburn". But it is Higginbottom's great achievement to have moulded a style of singing which is neither over cultivated nor underdone. The ease with which both boys and men articulate the music disguises their special skill in tuning voice to voice to master the complexities of the longest line.

In their festive, five-part Magnificat, they made of its opening sentence a long, laughing paean of praise, threaded with the trills and turns of three trumpets. What little Catherine Pierard and Barbara Bonney had to do, they did sweetly enough. The choir snatched their "Suscepit Israel" away from them, although their affirmatory "Gloria" almost justified the theft. There was a moment of silence, as deep as only a Proms silence can be, for James Bowman's exquisite "Esprientes implevit bonis". The musically hungry were certainly filled with good things in abundance here. Th notes offered within one perfectly controlled breath contrasted almost palpably with the tiny simplicity of the rich being sent empty away.

.AAM/Hogwood Albert Hall/Radio 3/BBC 2

The evening's "Ouverture" had been Bach's Orchestral Suite No 4 in D Major. This was the Academy at its very best: trumpets and timpani stepping neatly aside to uncover the nimble and revealing phrasing of the strings; Bourrées, Gavotte and Menuets truly and joyfully danced.

This criss-crossing of musical currents within seemingly instinctive, yet obviously carefully rehearsed, relationships of metre and tempo was the main delight, too, of the Concerto for Two Violins in D Minor. The playing of the two soloists, Simon Standage and Micaela Comberti was less than inspiring.

While it is always good to hear the opening Vivace shorn of rhetoric, the spiky, even laconic, dialogue between the two leaned towards the worldweary. The Largo, too, was played as if just one sequence too many. But once the Terpsichorean muse reappeared in the dancing finale, the band champi-oned its soloists, urging them on from one conceit to another.

Theatre: Benedict Nightingale on the Edinburgh Festival production of Harley Granville Barker's The Voysey Inheritance

Parable of a piratical paterfamilias

o doubt it would have been better if the Edinburgh Festival had staged a latter-day equivalent of Eliot's Cocktail Party or disinterred another Renaissance masterpiece, such as Lindsay's Three Estates, but those now far-off feats are hard to repeat at a time when every theatre is frantically searching for new plays and new old

Again, it would have been nice if some epoch-changing company had been uncovered in the jungles of Senegal and transported to Auld Reekie, or if Mnouchkine had taken her Atreus saga to Edinburgh instead of the Bradford mill she crammed with actors earlier this summer. But exciting imports are not easily found. We all know a festival director would be more likely to serve up the kind of strenuously imaginative effort we secretly dread: four hours in which Germans in boilersuits denounce consumerism or masked Japanese debate the ethics of violence.

Whatever may be urged against this year's programme, and specifically against its opening production, at least a bit of enterprise has gone into its choosing. The idea is to take two not-quite-major dramansts and, by presenting several troupes in several of their plays, to put them more securely on the cultural map.

There is, of course, a danger of achieving exactly the opposite. We may feel so biffed and banged by the twinning of Harley Granville Barker and C.P. Taylor that we want to burn their works and desecrate their graves. The burden of proof is on the Northern Stage, the Orange Tree and the other companies on furlough in Edinburgh. Have they the creative necromancy to bring dead

The first signs are not good. Of all the plays in this festival, Barker's Voysey Inheritance would seem the surest of success. It was revived at the National Theatre in 1989, and events since then have given it new timeliness. Old Voysey was a solicitor, not a publisher, and died in bed, not the Atlantic, but he plundered the funds in his trust and left the deficit as a legacy to his beirs. Whether it comes in the form of a play written in 1905 or a news event that occurred in 1991, the tale can tantalise and grip. Yet William Gaskill's production at the Royal Lyceum Theatre (until Saturday) only fleetingly catches the suspense that many must have felt as Maxwell's defalcations were revealed.

This may be the fault of Barker. His mind daunted even Shaw, who called him "incomparably the most cultivated person whom circumstances had driven into the theatre at that time", meaning the Edwar-dian age, and others found him far too cultivated. Maugham thought he needed "more force, more go, more bluntness, more guts, more beef", and Lawrence assailed his "bony, bloodless drama". For Barker: the Voysey saga was a moral parable, interesting mainly because of the intellectual speculation it irst, it allowed him to attack Edwardian pretension. The firm that old Voysey leaves behind is a pillar of city respectability, but the rot runs deep. clones among his family and friends belie their high-minded rhetoric by demanding a cover-up or preferential treatment for themselves or both. Not much honesty, decency or charity when John Bull's wallet is threatened, it seems.

Second, Barker made an unlikely hero of Voysey's son Edward, who is appalled by his father's frauds, yet continues to fiddle with the accounts, robbing Peter to pay Paul

and making good all the losses he can. That is illegal yet moral, dishonest yet honourable, and it turns a priggish boy into an impressively courageous man. So Barker suggests, and goes on to ask equally unconventional questions about wealth itself. Whom and what is Edward sacrificing himself to pro-tect? If we had to invent a financial system from scratch, would we come up with Edwardian capitalism? Barker the sophisticate plays too obviously with ideas, yet the play itself is far from abstract. Imagine the situation. It is as if a nervous curate suddenly discovered that, take or leave a leg or hand, his much-loved bishop was Long John Silver or Captain Hook. Imagine Edward's inner chaos, especially when he takes up Inns-of-Court piracy himself. Imagine the turmoil in the family as they find their beliefs and their security disappearing.

Yet where is the turnoil at the Lyceum? The production gets off on the wrong foot, since Tenniel Evans has little of the buccaneering charisma old Voysey needs, and it never settles afterwards. Peter Lindford's grave Edward has a nice, tense enounter with Frank Middlemass's Booth, the most spoiled of the friends his father has robbed, but not a lot else. Barker's notorious dispassion cannot excuse Lindford's failure to bring the character's pain

As for the supporting actors well, Peter Blythe is comfy enough in the play's easiest role, Edward's blimpish brother. But even he seems curiously unsurprised to be told at his father's funeral that the old boy was a criminal. Indeed, the whole family reacts to the prospect of disgrace and poverty as if to a summer cold. Neither Barker, nor the Edinburgh Festival's experimentalism, can fairly be judged by

Wagner, at length

RICHARD WAGNER, a composer no stranger to grandiose projects, would surely have approved of Philips Records' latest venture. This week the company issues the Richard Wagner Edition in Britain: a collection of CDs. video cassettes and laser discs that will bring into the living rooms of dedicated Wagnerites the whole operatic repertoire of the Bayreuth Festival in sound and pictures. The edition, made up entirely of Bayreuth performances, has been produced over the course of the last 20 years, and includes such famous (and infamous) events as the Patrice Chéreau staging of the Ring. Götz Friedrich's of Lohengrin and Tannhäuser. Harry Kupfer's of Der fliegende Hol-länder, and Wolfgang Wag-ner's of Meistersinger and Parsifal. The conductors include Pierre Boulez, James Levine and Kari Böhm.

The price of all this Wag-ner? Music Discount Centre in London quotes around £330 for the 18 videos or £311 for the 32 CDs. And if the Wagnerites want a little light reading to accompany this mammoth armchair experience, next month Thames and Hudson is publishing the 432-page Wagner Compendium, edited by the Times music critic Barry Millington.

Last chance . . .

THE German playwright Botho Strauss's Seven Doors - a surreal car's cradle of confrontations, forlornly funny, mischievously menacing, amusingly abstruse - is spun gracefully enough by David Farr's direction to stop us asking what it is about. Some excellent acting turns this kaleidoscope of unconnected sketches into a revue on the theme of Angst, from a recent suicide discovering the banality of hell, to newlyweds bickering their way from bliss to resentfulness. The effect is like trying to escape from a series of jovial nightmares by playing with a television remote control. Well up to the usual standards in European theatre at the Gate in Notting Hill (071-229 0706), where it ends on Saturday.

In particular there are Kuba pieces which could come straight from the hand of Klee. The way in which applied curved shapes are pieced together across the whole square surface looks like a deliberate illustration of Klee's ideas on abstract design, satisfying for-mal criteria while retaining an informal, organic feeling. That makes them seem, like Klee's paintings, as though they grew spontaneously out of one serious yet playful

Let's stay in for the play

n the stage, two glamorous grannies are belting out the parts of Helen of Troy and Clytennes-tra. In the wings sit two less glamorous grannies - their understudies, Phoebe and Regina. What goes on in their minds each night, as they wait for the actresses out there to faint, fall or die?

This was the question posed by Richard Crane's excellent comedy Understudies (Radio 3, Sunday). Phoebe (Dorothy Tutin) is so worked up at the idea of playing Helen that she herself almost faints in rehearsal. For her the theatre is

Regina, or "Reg", takes a very different view. She has been understudying the same actress, "the Dame", for 25 years, and in all that time has never gone on; all she wants now is to finish her knitting and go to Sainsbury's next morning. She regards acting as just a trick, and herself as no more than "a library of the Dame's tricks".

Regina was Penelope Keith, and she and Turin played beautifully together. Tutin irrepressible in her enthusiasms. Keith puncturing them with perfectly timed proved to be just another demonstration of "the trick". The only question left unanswered was how after years, presumably, of failure Phoebe had kept her girlish excitement. She wasn't young — in fact, if she had had a first world war soldier as her lover, as she claimed; she was almost impossibly old. That mystery apart, Understudies made a very funny, poignant hour,

She introduces women into her father's merry dinners: she marches into the house of a singer she hears rehearsing, and soon finds plenty of work for her to do.

The situation is not quite as dramatic as it might sound. because we get too many of the thoughts in Lucilla's head and not enough action - and when we do, everyone proves as weak as water before Lucilla's impenious ways. they get here. That kind of over-emphasis is too often the Achilles heel of Radio 4 programmes at the moment. Radio 5 is proving very professional in its occasional drama spots. Sunday morning saw a version of a J.R.R. Tolkien story about Britain in the days before King Arthur, Farmer Giles of Ham. The eminently suitable marrator was Sir Michael Horders, who by now has a voice that sounds as old as Cronos himself

Tolkien did not put much effort into this story of giants and dragons, but there are good touches, as when a giant gets a blunderbussful of old crockery in his eye from Farmer Giles (Brian Blessed) and thinks it is no more than a dragonfly's sting.....

There is also a good satirical scene, in which the knights are reluctant to do anything about fighting a dragon. They ex-plain that they are too busy with the Christmas tournament at the moment, and after Christmas will come the New Year holiday, and then, of course, there's the Feast of fewer than they were where are the Magnus Pykes and Barbara Woodhouses of today? — and less likely, in these days of satellite and video, to make a nationwide impression in the same way. More than mere self-promotion or idiosyncratic over-emphasis is required. Specialist, even arcane knowledge is an asset, and perhaps only Parrick Moore and John McCririck (of Channel 4 Racing), still qualify for the description, apart from Keith Floyd, who is at once the Fanny and Johnny Cradock de nos jours. Floyd on Spain (BBC 2), which started its seven-week run last night, in Galicia, found our hero talking almost non-stop, walking almost nonstop and drinking wine, well, quite frequently. He and his cameraman Clive North, who was too frequently addressed and instructed, literally on camera, breathlessly explored this temperate region of northwestern Spain.

All tredit to his director. Keith Pritchard, and editor, Ian Butcher, for the clarity of the resulting programme, but it has to be said that, while entertaining you, Floyd also teaches you a thing or two. whether you are aware of it or DERWENT MAY not As he swept past, anecdores, gobbets of social history.

The eyes were tempted to relax and enjoy the rain-washed beauty of the mountains, vineyards and seascapes, but the ears were simultaneously tackling the whooshes, bangs and thundering hooves of various fiestas and Floyd's own, stream-of-losing-consciousness, monologues. These were strong on local produce and the importance of freshness, but less confident on quantities and cooking times. He's no Delia Smith, then;

and neither is he much like that other television cook who always had wine on hand, Graham Kerr, the Galloping Gourmet. He does not venture into the ethnic territory marked out by Kenneth Lo and Madhur Jaffrey, nor does he play the star chef demonstrating trade secrets, such as the Roux brothers or Mosimann. For all his real knowledge,

Floyd is projected as a garru-lous, well-travelled "bloke", the cove in the corner of the saloon bar who just happens to have picked up a few good ideas while he has been away. Nothing fancy or effete about him — although did you notice he called the cameraman "dear" when he splashed the lens with water? Probably just one of his jokes. In his champi-

His Galician cooking, principally of fish and seafood, with generous quantities of garlic and paprika, accurately reflected the region's strengths, but seemed unlikely to have mass appeal in Britain. Here, for the majority, fish have fingers and wear heavy brown overcoats, and garlic ioyd's primary television function is, then, that of a gastronomic David Attenborough, trekking through the culinary guano on our behalf and offering a succession of would-youbelieve-it tales from abroad, to be repeated next day in the train or the pub: "Did you see those Spaniards, eating octopus and whole cloves of garlic? Disgusting! A snowball and a lager-and-blackcurrant please. Oh, and a bag of pickledonion flavour crisps."

Like a shrewd teacher, faced with a class of no-hopers. Floyd seasons his apparently shambolic jaunts with enough science to hook the imagination of those who are open to wider experiences and tastes. His is not landmark television, but it is a civilising influence.

Thirty years of laughter

IF YOU want to see whether any of your kitchen equipment is considered a work of art, go to the Centre Pompidou in Paris.

There, well displayed in a Perspex case, you may find the small travelling iron in its tartan bag that you bought in the Sixties (and are still using), or the Braun coffee grinder that you bought last month.

The Pompidou Centre, or the Beaubourg as everybody calls it. has a vast exhibition on at the moment It is called Manifeste — but in the meaning not so much of "manifesto" as of a ship's "manifest". a record of what it has on board. This exhibition brings out of store practically everything the Centre has collected in the spheres of art and design from the years 1960 to 1990.

Outside the Beaubourg on the square it is always fun, with the fireeaters and the acrobats: but inside, this time, it is fun too. The ground floor is entirely given over to "Design" (the same word in French), with the exhibits ranging from a complete aeroplane of 1960. a Mirage III E by Marcel Dassault. to a Philippe Starck lemon-squeezer of 1987 that is like a slim gothic

The story that this section illustrates is of the change, over the 30 years, from streamlined, functional design to a new outburst of personal fancy. The chairs alone tell the tale and there is a splendid collection of them, for it seems as though every designer feels the need to express himself through a chair. It is the index of modern design. There are Arne Jacobsen's soft Egg armchair. Verner Panton's Cone in metal. Gaetano Pesce's Dalila with enormous, chunky resin legs, Garouste and Bonetti's Barbaric Chair of leather and metal with wing decorations like a Viking's helmet. What scope for the human bottom!

Radical post-war art may have lost its power to shock, but it can still keep us amused, says Derwent May display of the art of these 30 years, is also mostly fun. The fact is that the major art movements of this period - Pop Art, Arte Povera, minimal art, conceptual art — were all revolutionary attacks on us. attempts to grab our eyes violently and wrench them either into looking at new things, or looking differently at old things. Consequently they were taken very seriously at the time, both by their supporters and their many

Now, however, their power to shock has faded. On the whole, they have done their work on our perceptions quite successfully; but they have not dislodged the great artists of the past, whose work remains as beautiful and moving as it ever was. We are neither overexcited by, nor afraid of Andy Warhol or Joseph Beuys or Gilbert and George any more; and we can see the witty or joky aspects of their inventiveness — what the critics all along, in fact, have called their

"ludic element". Go to the "conceptual art" section on the mezzanine floor of the Beaubourg, and you find that it is like a playground. Here, first, there is an installation by the American Dan Graham called Present Continuous Past(s). It is a small room with a hidden camera in it and a television screen, on which you suddenly see your head and face as they were a moment or two before, but slightly distorted and moving more slowly. It startles you and makes you laugh, and then you start making faces which in a moment come back at you as well. There are queues of adults and children waiting to get into that room, attracted by the laughter coming from it.

Not far away is Attempt To Raise Hell by Denis Oppenheim. You are drawn to it by a periodic ringing sound, and you find that it consists of a small figure sitting on a low dais, who by some clockwork mechanism regularly knocks his heart against a bell a few inches away, from him. The intervals between blows are just long enough to keep. you waiting nervously, and the blows come suddenly enough to make you laugh with relief and perhaps at the same time get some shameful tingle of sadistic pleasure.

You can go in the same way through the other sections, enjoying the humour and ingenuity of the works, without taking them too-seriously. And this, I think, is the right way to look at much of the art of these 30 years — what will survive

t the Beaubourg itself, one is encouraged to see it in the perspective of a greater period of art by the presence on the fourth floor of the 1905-1960 collection, including the recent Matisse dation.

A dation is something accepted by the state in lieu of death duties, and this one consists of some striking works by Matisse himself, and others by artists such as Rouault and Cézanne, which were part of the estate of Matisse's son Pierre who died in 1989.

The architecture section completes the show. Here there is an extensive display of maquettes of buildings — but many visitors may feel by now that they want to go out and look at some of the real things in the city itself.

As the guide to the exhibition says, the Centre Pompidou itself is the

The latest eruption of bad blood to break out of the postmodern fortress on the Bastille was the resignation this month of Philippe Bélaval, the director-general and third in the chain of command after its president. Pierre Bergé, and general administrator, Georges-François Hirsch. His resignation followed those of the director of productions, the scenic director and the director of personnel.

Bélaval, a 36-year-old high-bones about his conflict with Berge, the former boss of the Yves St Laurent empire who last hit the non-operatic headlines when he sacked Daniel Barenboim from his job as musical director in early 1989, months before the grand opening of the new Bastille.

In a letter which he distributed to the media. Belaval accused Bergé of undercutting his authority by reaching a private accord with the opera's unions to postpone a deadline for a new contract. He also attacked him for tolerating what he said was a campaign for his dismissal by Myung-Whun Chung, the South Korean who succeeded Barenboim as musical

stead, the new season will start with Mozart's Marriage of Figaro on September 24. The accident served to worsen the already bad labour relations at the Bastille, which has been plagued by strikes and stoppages for the past two years. Bergé, who is now hunting for a new director general, has been playing down Bélaval's departure. "He's a very nice fellow, Phi-ed the dispute was the collapse of scenery which killed a preferred him to stay preferred him to stay on ... but its better to lose a director-general than a musical director."

Barenboim recently pinned the trouble on the failure to start with new industrial relations when they moved the main opera from the Palais Garnier.

They took everything from Garnier to the Bastille as if the only thing wrong at Garnier was the walls, which was not the case. Nothing was renegonated, nothing was re-dis-cussed. They took all the old bad habits that have been accumulating and perfecting themselves in Garnier for a little over a century and brought them to the Bastille."

the rest of the large Wagner clan. After his brother's death in 1966, Wolfgang took over artistic as well as administrative responsibility, and began to mould Bayreuth to his will and in his own image. He first edged out Wieland's widow Gertrud. Wieland's son Wolf-Siegfried, or "Wummi", is a producer who has worked in many opera houses, but not Bayreuth. The last time he set foot there, he was ejected from the canteen by his uncle in brutal fashion, his mother says. Even Wolfgang's own son, Gottfried, is included in the Hausverbot and has to content himself with lecturing on his great-grandfather. To mark the 1976 centenary of the Ring, Wolfgang Wagner divorced his first wife and married his press secretary, Gudrun, by whom he has a daughter. The girl can scarcely yet inherit the fourth generation, but the suspicion is widely bruited that Wolfgang sees Gudrun (and she sees herself) as the "new Cosima". Since Wolfgang is 73 - and since Cosima outlived Wagner by 47 years this is not a prospect which fills the rest of the family with joy. They will certainly put a stop to it if they can find the means to do so.

Between 1810 and 1850 more than 1,000 German artists lived in Rome and the surrounding countryside, where they tried to counter the onslaught of the modern age and all its social and political tensions with dreams of spiritual renewal. However, their attempt to revive German religious art by imitating Raphael's purity and Direr's profundity was somewhat heavyhanded.

Their canvases tend to be ponderous and sentimental, not least because they were better at handling contours than colour. They were draughtsmen rather than painters, and their drawings are all the more enchanting for not being weighed down by religious fervour. A hundred drawings by the German Romantics, from a private German collection, are

Unveiling the new Muslim

Under cover: Muslim women, their faces and bodies covered, meet on a bench in Marrakech. Some believe that veiling is a male distortion of medieval theology aba Risahuddin is English. Her mother father an Anglican. Six years ago she became a Muslim: "I became interested in Islam through talking to friends and following that up with my own reading," she says. I discovered that it was something I was completely comfortable with."

Now a trustee of the Calamus Foundation, which promotes understanding between Muslims. Christians and Jews, she attempts to persuade. an often hostile British public which seeks to oppress women into medieval subservience to men. "To some extent it is a stereotype Islam has helped to create," she concedes. "The veil is pre-Islamic but men have seized the theology and tried to subvert it but anyone who reads the Koran with an open mind will see that these are cultural accretions."

Mrs Risaluddin wrote to The Times in response to Matthew Parris's piece on Muslim women ("Still the world's outcasts", August 10) to say that while she agreed that the oppression of Muslim women by Muslim men, "in some societies and to varying degrees", was an important human rights issue, the debate concerning women and Islam had already begun.

The British view of Muslim women is often encrusted with prejudice, with hasty conclusions drawn from sightings of a different culture in shops, in. the street but rarely from conversation. "In this view, all families are extended, children respect their elders, religious faith is total and unquestioning and women are veiled creatures living in the shadows." writes Yasmin Ali in a new collection of essays, Refusing Holy Orders: Women and Fundamentalism in Britain to be published by Virago on September 3. Yet even before the war, there was an Islamic revival in Bosnia. As the Yugoslavian dream of a non-partisan communist state went wrong, everyone wanted an identity, according to Cornelia Sarabji, an anthropologist at the School of Oriental and African Studies, who has worked in Bosnia. "People who'd never fasted during Ramadan did so, the mosques were packed. Some young women volun-tarily wore headscarves and long robes, others still liked the idea of being modern and understood Islam in different ways. But freedom to practice

Veiling among young Muslim women may be a statement of identity in a hostile and racist world, says Mrs Risaluddin: "It says to the world. 'I'm not just any old Asian, I'm a Muslim'." For some young Asian women it may also be a form of rebellionagainst the commercialisation of women's bodies in Western culture, a stand taken against pornography, sexual harassment and rape. The veil itself can take many different forms. Bedouin women of the desert need to be protected from the ravages of the climate and their veils are voluminous, more like hoods. Under Saudi law, the veil must be kept on at all times; some women do not even remove them to sleep. In the Yemen the veil is more like a decorative mask, covered with coins and silver tassels which give a precise value of a woman's worth. In some desert areas the veil gives way to elaborate face painting with thick, brightly coloured pastes. which serves the purpose of warding off evil spirits. Face painting may even be a juvenile phase from which women

Inevitably, the existing rationale for continuing to wear the veil is complex. When women work in the fields they are not of a higher social caste. During the Iranian revolution previously Westernised women took to wearing the chador, an all-encompassing black garment, both as a Down's babies) plus human chorionic gonadotrophin (high in Down's babies) in conjunction with the woman's age group to give a "screen positive" or "screen negative".

A "screen positive" means that the woman may have a one in 250 or greater chance of having a Down's baby; a higher risk, and she will be advised to have amniocentesis (the test for Down's and other abnormalities which involves drawing fluid from the womb and which carries a risk of miscarriage). Matter of the Mind

HOW and when was the human brain formed? What is the difference between mind and soul? Technical advances in biology are bringing scientists closer to the answers to ancient questions. Now, to coincide with the publication of Bright Air, Brilliant Fire: On the Matter of the Mind by Gerald Edelman, The Times in conjunction with Dillons and Allen Lane The Penguin Press is sponsoring a lecture on this subject.

The Times/Dillons Lecture:

Dr Edelman, a Nobel laureate and the director of the Neurosciences Institute, New York, and Oliver Sacks, Professor of Neurology at the Albert Einstein College of Medicine, New York, both argue that biology is the key to understanding the brain. Introduced by Colin Blakemore Professor of Physiology, Oxford University, Dr Edelman will speak on biology and the brain, followed by Dr Sacks on neurology and the soul.

Urban renewal pulled out of a HAT

Tenants in Liverpool last week voted to form the country's third Housing Action Trust. Rachel Kelly reports on the progress of the first such scheme

ora Short may seem an unlikely candidate for publicity. An 80-yearold council tenant, she an undistinguished ground-floor flat in a semi-detached, red-brick house on the North Hull estate. But earlier this year, Sir George Young, the housing minister popped in for a cup of tea and a photo opportunity. Council chiefs from around the country view Mrs Short's blue and white tiled kitchen with interest. Local government newsletters and the local press run regular features on her. There is even talk of Prince Charles paying a visit.

And why all this attention? Because the lady is the first of 6,000 residents to have her house refurbished under the government's Housing Action Trust scheme. Those in the housing world call them HATs, and last week the inhabitants of 67 tower blocks in Liverpool, comprising 5,337 homes, voted overwhelmingly to form Britain's third and biggest trust.

HATs, it seems, are Critics say finally taking off. It has taken more say more than four years. The money under the 1988 Housing Act. The idea was is needed to wrest control of most run-down estates and hand them over to private boards as part of the government's wider plan of scaling down the role of local authorities. New bodies, ministers thought, would be better than local authorities at running housing.

The government was caught on

the hop, however, by tenant loyalty to local authorities. Tenants said no to HATs in six estates singled out by the government in 1989, fearing that their security of tenure would be at risk or that rents would rise. Only in the south London borough of Southwark did plans get as far as a vote, but they were rejected by 80 per cent of tenants amid accusations that left-wing activists had scared tenants out of their wits and out of a HAT. Plans were abandoned: faces were red.

The scheme was consigned to the dust heap of council history until Hull City Council came to the government's rescue. To universal surprise, the Labour council, led by Pat Doyle, the pragmatic and politically astute council leader, and John Black, chairman of the council's housing committee, applied to set up a HAT, realising that the funds earmarked for earlier trusts were still lying in government coffers, up for grabs.

The deal was very much on the city's terms. The government's original idea was that HATs should be for the worst estates, but it was persuaded to create a trust in north Hull, even though the estate was in moderately good condition.

Mr Doyle also insisted that the HAT should have the option to revert to local authority control and that tenants would not have to pay rent rises until their homes were Hull council drummed up sup-port for the scheme, and Mr Doyle and local councillors ran a "Vote Yes campaign. Council support for a HAT was the key difference in Hull compared with the negativity of other councils, the environment department says.

Waltham Forest, in east London has now followed Hull's example and, under the scheme, £170 million is to be spent over eight to ten years. Four estates of multistores blocks are to be demol ished and replaced houses and Both councils saw the chance of tapping into government resources for refurbishment, although critics argue that neither estate represents the original aim of HATs, which was to target the most run-down and poorly maintained estates rather than the semi-detached, red-brick terraced houses typical of Hull. However, thanks to their HAT, North Hull council tenants have £50 million of government money to spend over five years on refurbishment. The council has handed over control of 2.084 homes to the newly formed trust, which has bought the houses with govern-ment money. The HAT board has 11 members and is chaired by David Liggins, a management consultant. Three seats have been given to members of the local authority, two to residents of the estate, one to a housing academic and others to local businessmen and women. .. As well as being responsible for renovation, the trust board acts as landlord, responsible for setting and collecting rents and regenerating the estate with community projects and job-creation schemes. After refurbishment, expected to take five years, residents will vote on their future landlord, with the option of a return to council control.

Meanwhile, tenants like Mrs

Short are having fun doing up their homes with the help of Wimpey, which has been appointed the main builder on the first area to be renovated. Showing off her refur-bished home, she says: "This is great isn't it? The flat seems so much bigger now."

Inside the flat where she has lived for the past 15 years, the bathroom has a new suite and is fully tiled. The kitchen has new units, the walls are papered and the floors have new carpets. There is also a new gas fire, wall-mounted lights, insulation, and double-glazed windows. An new intercom links to a warden charged with looking after elderly residents.

"I can't describe the difference," Mrs Short says. "It's much warmer terribly cold in the bedroom and the bathroom used to have damp." All the colours and designs were chosen by Mrs Short. Each resident was given a set of points on a menu to spend on housing features of their choice at design weekends and interviews at their homes with the community housing officers from the 26-member HAT staff. There are labels stuck to walls, kitchen units and carpets. points the object represents in a budget that the residents have to spend. Most expensive in points terms, taking up the entire allocation, is a single-storey extension of 8

"The council never paid us this kind of attention," Mrs Short says. Tenants were even asked for their choices over small items such as installing a rear-door canopy, or veneered internal doors, and HAT staff were available to answer

The estate has been split into five areas, and the trust has staggered work starts on each area. Work on the final area will not begin until 1995, so builders have started emergency roof repairs to prevent

The picture is rosy. Three other HATs, in Birmingham, Tower Hamlets and Brent, are now being planned, and Liverpool's recent resounding vote of confidence in the scheme will add impetus for more

But critics abound. HATs are McKechnie, director of Shelter, feels that HATs, along with other government schemes such as Estate Action and City Challenge, mask the low level of overall government publicity on one-off initiatives. "If you use the metaphor of the Christmas tree, these are the baubles and bright lights. The tree itself is having severe difficulty." Public expenditure on housing in England has nearly halved from £8,145 million in 1979 to £4,466 million in 1991-1992. The number of homes built for those on low incomes has fallen from 86,000 in 1980 to 22.854 in 1991, according to the Institute of Housing.

Money should be targeted at needy councils. Ms McKechnie HATs. The government's reply is that the problems on some estates can be solved only through HATs. with their mix of public, private and tenant participation. Mrs Short

not necessarily mean amping in the rain or braving the chill of the Channel for a swim. It is possible to rent a Scottish castle, 18th-century folly or simple cottage for a holiday.

Layla Paterson, the director of Blandings, has been letting 45 substantial holiday homes for six years and has seen such an upsurge in business she is desperate for more properties.

Ms Paterson tries to give a bespoke holiday service, at-tempting to meet individual needs, where possible. Most of the properties are at the upper end of the scale, in size and cost, although Woolbarn Cottage in the Cotswolds, which sleeps four, can cost as little as £270 a week.

Half of the Blandings properties, however, can be rented for about £2,000 a week. Chy An Eglos, a Georgian house overlooking St Michael's Mount in Cornwall, for example, sleeps 12 and bas a heated indoor swimming-pool

A big family seeking aristo-cratic splendid isolation, and not shy of spending £2,995 for a week, need look no further than Eilean Aigas near Inverness. This stands on its own island in the middle of the Beauly, famous for its salmon fishing, sleeps 16 and has a swimming-pool and two staff. Or they might consider Brandsby Hall, in the village of Brandsby, 15 miles north of York. The Georgian house sleeps 16 and costs £2,750.a week in high season.

The reasons for letting a house, or part of one, are varied. For some owners, it is a useful way to earn income on a second house that would otherwise stand empty most of the year. Others let a part of their house because since the children have left home, they need the extra money more than the Jenny Swinley enjoys it. She and her husband, a retired naval officer and now a fruit farmer, have been letting a wing of their late 18th-century Cotswold house for the past seven years through English Country Cottages. English Country Cottages (ECC) has been operating since 1977. The range of its 2,000 properties belies the company's name. While many of the genuine article are on offer, sleeping two or four. there are also some larger houses that can accommodate up to 20 guests.

Carolyn Groombridge of ECC noticed that the fashion for domestic holidays was aided by the Gulf war effect last year as people preferred not to travel abroad. This year the company has found its toric buildings, but to encourfigures holding un

The trust restores any buildings it buys with money from donations, legacies and occasionally grants. All are remarkable in some way, either architecturally, historically or for their position. Modern conveniences include plumbing, electricity and heating. They are furnished modestly but comfortably and each is provided with books about the neighbourhood and maps of the immediate area. Once sympathetic but functional restoration is complete, the property earns its keep by being rented.

Stephen and Tina Feast were looking for "something different", when they heard about the trust from friends. They looked through the trust's detailed guide to its properties to find "somewhere not too far from home, but at the same time remote".

This turned out to be Warden Abbey, Bedfordshire, built in 1537 on the site of a 12thcentury abbey. In the middle of a field, it has a Tudor chimney too high for the size of the present house and in-congruous crenellations, both of which hint at what was there before. Inside is an early 16th-century fireplace, oriel window, spiral staircase, a moulded oak ceiling and even a buttress from the original church. High season rental is £468. Dr Feast says: "I remember the sun coming through the window in the morning, the wonderful walks and eating dinner in the baronial grandeur." The oddities the trust has on offer read like a guide to British architecture from the Middle Ages to the mid-19th century and are too numerous to mention individually. From Palladio to the peculiar, a 19th-century mill to a Napoleonic Martello Tower, the trust has enough variety to satisfy

A week in Provence

f you take MPs to be the arbiters of taste, renting a house in Tuscany has finally gone out of fashion. For years, Chiantishire, as Tuscan second-home owner John Mortimer christened it in his novel, Summer's Lease, reigned supreme. Neil Kinnock patronised the palio in Siena. Norman Lamont habitually rents a house. English chattering-class accents dominated the watering holes of Siena, Florence, Lucca and Pisa, Volvos blocked the roads and English bambini looked pale in the piazzas. But this year, politicians are finding pastures new, chiefly in France; and when there, chiefly in the South. John Smith, the new Labour leader, will divide his time between Scotland and France. Michael Howard, the environment secretary, has been worrying staff about installing a fax in his gite. Gillian Shepherd, employment secretary. David Mellor, heritage secretary, and Peter Lilley, social security secretary, are all heading to France. Others seem to be following the politicians' cue and forsaking chianti for champagne: Sir Andrew Lloyd Webber and Maurice Saatchi to name but two. The only exception is Mr Lamont.

who stays loyal to Tuscany. The burgeoning popularity of Provence is thanks, in part, to Peter Mayle-inspired fantasies of summer months spent sipping pastis in a café in Menerbes, and in part to its accessibility and the growing cost of flights to Italy.

A high-season, return air ticket to Italy would cost about £200, with car hire at around £200 a week. Insurance firms in Europe insist that those with more than three children must hire a van, which puts up the cost even further and annoys many who have left their Volvos at home. The popularity of Provence is also a reflection of an increase in the number of suitable houses for rent that match the comfort of their Tuscan counterparts. The problem in the past has been

"it's really been quite difficult to find good quality houses to rent in Provence until now. Traditionally, the French haven't let out their homes, and tend to live in them all the year. The Italians, though, seem to that there are legal complications for the many who are not owner-occupiers. In contrast, Tuscans wanting to let their properties are helped by the government. Suzanne Camp-bell, of Sovereign Villas Italia. says: "If the local people want to set up in tourism, they are helped by considerable state subsidies. In the past, most of the houses for rent in France were either simple gites, dotted around the countryside, or d'Azur, with farmhouses and country seats in between, chiefly to be found in the pages of the Sunday newspapers. Companies such as Brittany Ferries, Gites de France and Thomas Cook specialise in the eite market, and there are letting agents such as Riviera Retreats for rented accommodation in the South. Gites have their critics. In certain parts of France, notably the overcrowded Côte d'Azur, they are often little more than our-

is superior to many of the gites to let. It is a modern, semi-detached house in the small village of Quartier Fournel in the Var area of Provence, one of three holiday homes around a courtyard and patio. A simple building with whitewashed interiors, the house includes an open-plan living room and dining area, kitchen, two bedrooms - one double and one twin - a shower room, garden furniture and electric heating. Inside, the furnishings are described as "tasteful and practical" by Brittany Ferries.

The gite costs £528 for two weeks, which works out at £132 a person in a party of four between August 14 and 27. During September, the price falls to £111 a person for the first ten days of the month, then drops to £93 a person until September 25. Then the price remains at £82 a person until May 14, 1993.

Prices increase if the party is fewer than four people, and include return car-ferry

Riviera Retreats is based at Mougins Le Haut, near Cannes. Its selection of houses tend to include the use of a gymnasium. One house, to rent for up to £90,000 a month, stands on the water's edge in Villefranche and has its own private quay, with what Richard Wolf from the company describes as "full security and staff". His is a world for those who flit between the Cannes film festival and the Monaco Grand Prix, the successors of the aristocratic sybarites who first popularised life on the Riviera in

For those in search of quieter villas in the Provençal countryside behind the coast. Mr Marquis has just begun to offer houses for rent in Provence. "We are reflecting the demand," he says. Next year, he will have a 100 or so houses for rent, whereas this year he has only 20 properties on his books. Some come from English owners who have failed to sell but who want extra cash during the recession: others come from French householders who are realising that there are profits to be made.

Exception to allow modification of pensions

Before O. Due, President and Judges R. Joliet, F. A. Schockweiler, F. Grévisse, P. J. G. Kapteyn, G. F. Mancini, J. C. Moitinho de Almeida, G. C. Rodriguez Iglesias. M. Diez de Velasco, M. Zuleeg and J. L.

Миттау Advocate General W. Van Gerven (Opinion May 12) [Judgment July 7]

The exceptions to the principle of equal treatment for men and women in matters of social secunity, provided for by the Commuislature, were intended to allow member states to maintain temporarily the advantages ac-corded to women with respect to retirement in order to permit them progressively to modify their pen-sion systems in that respect without disrupting the complex financial equilibrium of those systems.

The Court of Justice of the European Communities so held in answering a question submitted to it by the Queen's Bench Division of the High Court, for a preliminary ruling on the interpretation of article 7(1)(a) of Council Directive No 79/7 EEC of December 19, 1978 on the progressive im-plementation of the principle of women in matters of social security (OJ 1979 L6 p24).

Article 4(1) of the Directive provided, inter alia, that the principle of equal treatment means that there shall be no discrimination whatsoever on ground of sex either directly, or indirectly by reference in particular to marinal or family status, in particular as concerns — the scope of the schemes and the conditions of access thereto; — the obligation to contribute and the calculation of

Article 7(1)(a) of the Directive allowed member states to exclude from the scope of the Directive "the determination of pensionable age for the purposes of granting old-age and retirement pensions and the possible consequences thereof for other benefits

In the United Kingdom all employers and the majority of the working population, whether employed or self-employed, were li-able to pay contributions to the national social security scheme, membership of which was

The Social Security Act 1975 made provision for the collection of national insurance contributions and for the payment of benefits. Benefits might be "contributory", subject to the payment of contributions, or "non-contributory", funded by general taxation. Contributory benefits included the basic retirement pension. In order to qualify for a basic pension a person must have at-tained pensionable age and have satisfied the conditions laid down concerning contributions. Section 27(1) of the 1975 Act defined nable age as 65 for men and pensionable age as our los sensions were 60 for women. Contributions were payable by workers throughout their working life as defined by section 27(2) of the 1975 Act.

The Equal Opportunities Commission sought, first, a declaration that the United Kingdom state pension scheme unlawfully discriminated against men on the ground of their sex, in as much as it required men to pay contribu-tions for 44 years and women for 39 years in order to qualify for the same full basic retirement pension, and in as much as a man working between the ages of 60 and 64 paid contributions whereas a woman in the same situation did not, and second, a declaration that the Secretary of State for Social Security was in breach of the obligation laid down in article 5 of the Directive requiring member states to take the necessary measures to ensure that any discrimi-

The High Court, before ruling on the EOC's application, submitted a preliminary question to the European Court on the interpretation of article 7(1)(a) of the natory provisions falling within the scope of the Directive were

In its judgment the European Court of Justice ruled: It was common ground both in the proceedings in the High Court submitted to the European Court that the application of the contributory pension scheme concerned in the main proceedings gave rise to the two forms of discrimination between men and women described in the order for

By its question the High Court sought to ascertain whether those forms of discrimination, which were in principle contrary to article 4(1) of the Directive, were nonethe less temporarily permissible by virtue of the power conferred upon member states by article 7(1)(a) to derogate from the Directive by fixing different pensionable ages for men and women for the purposes of granting old-age and etirement pensions.

The question therefore was whether that power of derogation merely allowed men and women to be treated unequally with respect to entitled to a pension or whether it also covered other legislative and financial consequences flowing from a different pensionable age, such as the obligation to contribute until that age. Since the text of the derogation

pensionable age for the purposes of granting old-age and retirement pensions, it was clear that it concerned the moment from hich pensions became payable. The text did not, however, refer expressly to discrimination in reto contribute for the purposes of the pension or the calculation Such forms of discrimination therefore fell within the scope of the derogation only if they were found to be necessary in order to achieve the objectives which the Directive was intended to pursue by allowing member states to retain a different pensionable age for men and women.

Although the preamble to the Directive did not state the reasons for the derogations which it laid down, it could be deduced from the nature of the exceptions contained in article 7(1) that the Community legislature intended to allow memthe advantages accorded to women with respect to retirement in order to permit them progressively to modify their pension systems in that respect without disrupting the complex financial equilibrium of those systems, the importance of which could not be ignored.

In a system such as the one concerned in the main proceed-ings, whose financial equilibrium was based on men contributing for a longer period than women, a different pensionable age for men and women could not be maintained without altering the existing financial equilibrium, unless such inequality with respect to the length of contribution periods was also maintained.

Life sentence policy lawful

parte S Before Mr Justice Henry (Judgment July 16)

The policy of the Home Secretary that life sentence prisoners who had been transferred from prison to hospital, pursuant to the Mental Health Act 1983, would normally be discharged by way of licence under section 61 of the Criminal Justice Act 1967 rather than by conditional or absolute discharge under provisions in the 1983 Act was legitimate and was not a fetter upon the exercise of his discretion. Mr Justice Heary so held in a reserved judgment in the Queen's Bench Division dismissing the Bench Division dismissing the applicant's application for judicial applicant's application for judicial review challenging, inter dia, the legality of the Home Secretary's policy, first announced in the House of Commons on July 23.

1985 (Hansard, sixth series, vol. 83, col. 465-6). Mr Edward Fitzgerald for the applicant; Mr Stephen Richards for the secretary of state.

MR JUSTICE HENRY said that a life sentence prisoner's only more to release was on licence under section 61 of the 1967 Act: see the summary of the statutory framework in R v Parole Board, Exparte Bradley (1991) WLR 134, 140-141), and In re Findlay (1985) AC 318, 332-333) for the relationship of the Parole Board to the secretary of state.

A prisoner so released remained subject to supervision for the rest of his life; he might be recalled to prison in certain circumstances see section 62.

Where such a prisoner while in prison had been transferred to hospital either under section 47 or under section 49 of the 1983 Act. there were three possible routes to release back into the community after expiry of the tariff period | the appropriate length of time a pris-oner should serve to satisfy the requirements of deterrence and retribution]:
First was release on licence

under section 61 of the 1967 Act and pursuant to section 50(1)(b) of the 1983 Act. Second and third were release under sections 42(2) or 74(2). Under those routes the prisoner might be discharged ei-ther absolutely or conditionally. If absolutely, then he was not subject to supervision or any liability to recall; if conditionally, he was so

It was against that background that the secretary of state an-nounced the change of policy in 1985 from the previous practice to discharge such persons under sec-tion 42(2) of the 1983 Act.

His Lordship said that in evidence before the court from th Home Office the rationale for the policy was stated to be to ensure that the mandatory life sentence required by law, or the dis-cretionary life sentence imposed by the court, which was intended to last for life, could not be countermanded: also, it was to ensure consistency of treatment among all those sentenced to life imprisonment. The evidence stated further that the circumstances could arise where the secretary of state might exercise his discretion to discharge under the 1983 Act, for example where evidence, not available to the sentencing court, suggested that the person was suffering from a mental disorder at the time of the

But the applicant submitted that f practice adopted, the secretary of state deprived transferred life sentence prisoners from the potential benefit of absolute discharge, and so lettered his discretion unlawfully.

Since, in his Lordship's view, the secretary of state adopted the policy for reasons which he might legitmately entertain, it did not seem that the laying down of the policy case of a femered discretion. Properly implemented, such policies and practices led to like justice in like cases, and to the consistency and predictability that were both attributes of good administration.

What was impermissible was when over-rigid application of the policy or practice prevented proper ion and treatment of distinguishing features of the in-

There was nothing sinister in the fact that other exceptions had not been spelt out; the failure to identify those in advance was not a

For the court to find that the secretary of state had unlawfully fettered his discretion involved discounting the Home Office's evidence that the secretary of state's decision on the appropriate dis-charge route was based on his duty to ensure that the public was protected from harm and the needs of the patient, and that any representations to set aside the licy would be considered on the merits of the particular case. Accordingly there was nothing

Advocate General F. G. Jacobs (Opinion April 8, 1992) [Judgment June 17] Where the purchaser of goods from an intermediary brought proceedings against the manufacturer for damages in respect of defects in the goods, there was no contractual bond between that sub-

since the latter had not freely

entered into any undertaking of a contractual nature towards the The Court of Justice of the European Communities so held in replying to a question by the French Cour de Cassation for a preliminary ruling on the inter-purchased in 1984 and 1985 two metal polishing machines from a Swiss company which was the second respondent. It fitted to those machines a suction system which was manufactured by Handte Germany, but had been sold and installed by Societé Handte France.

In 1987 TMCS brought proceedings against the Swiss company, Handte Germany and Handte France before the Tribunal de Grande Instance [Re-gional Court] Bonneville for compensation for the loss arising from the fact that the equipment did not comply with the rules relating to health and safety at work and that it was not suitable for the use for which it had been intended

On May 4, 1988 that court declared that it had no purisdiction ratione loci to deal with the claim against the Swiss company. How-ever, it held that it did have jurisdiction on the basis of article 5(1) of the Brussels Convention to rule upon the application against Handte Germany and Handte

On March 20, 1989 the Cour national proceedings (TMCS) had d'Appel Chambery dismissed the appeal lodged by Handte Germany on the basis that the action brought by TMCS against it was an action relating to the liabi the manufacturer for defects affecting the goods which had been sold and that such a direct action by a sub-purchaser of the goods against a manufacturer was of a contrac-tual nature with regard both to French law and the Convention and that therefore the judge at first instance was correct to assume jurisdiction in the place where the obligation of the contract had to be fulfilled pursuant to article 5(1) of Taking the view that article 5(1) was not applicable in the context of a chain of contracts, Handte

Germany appealed to the Cour de Cassation, which stayed the proceedings and asked the European Court of Justice for a prelimi-In its judgment the European Court ruled as follows: The concept of matters relating to a contract" within the meaning of article 5(1) of the Convention was to be interpreted independently, with reference principally to the scheme and objectives of the Convention in order to ensure its uniform application in all the contracting states; that concept could not therefore be interpreted as referring to a definition given by the relevant national law to the legal relationship at issue before

Rules of special or exclusive jurisdiction and those relating to prorogation of jurisdiction therefore derogated from the general principle laid down in the first paragraph of article 2 of the Convention that the competent courts were those of the contracting state in whose territory the defendant was domiciled. The status as a general principle of that rule of jurisdiction was explained by the fact that, in principle, it enabled a defendant to defend himself more easily. Consequently, rules of jurisdiction which demosted from that general principle could not give rise to an interpretation which went beyond the circumstances envisaged by the It followed that the concept of

"matters relating to a contract", within the meaning of article 5(1) within the meaning of article 5(1) could not be understood as referring to a situation in which there was no undertaking which had party with regard to another.

With regard to an action which derogated from the general principle of that Convention should be interpreted in such a brought by a sub-purchaser of goods which had been purchased from an intermediate vendor est the manufacturer with a view to obtaining compensation for the loss arising from the fact that the goods did not conform to the relevant rules, it was necessary to hold that there was no contrac-

had not entered into any obligation of a contractual nature towards the sub-purchaser. Moreover, and particularly in the circumstances where there was a chain of international contracts. contractual obligations between the parties might vary from one contract to another such that the contractual rights which a subpurchaser might raise against his mmediate vendor were not necessarily the same as those which way as to enable a defendant with normal vigilance reasonably to foresee the court, other than that of the state of his domicile, before which he might be sued.

In a situation such as that referred to in the main proceedings, the application of the rule of special jurisdiction laid down in article 5(1) of the Convention to a dispute between the sub-purchaser of an article and the manufacturer was not forseeable for the latter was, therefore, incompatible with the principle of legal certainty

On those grounds the Court

Article 5(1) of the Convention of September 27, 1968 on jurisdiction and the enforcement of judgments in civil and commercial matters was to be interpreted as meaning that it did not apply to a dispute between the sub-purchaser of an article and its manufacturer, who was not the vendor, on the basis of defects in the article or the unsuitability of it for the use for which it had been intended.

Drumming again: Lynn Redgrave with Rick Allen (7.30pm)

7.30 Fighting Back: Rick Allen

CHOICE: Rick Allen, drummer with the heavy metal band Def Leppard, was driving on New Year's eve 1984 when, as he puts it, he did not see a left-hand bend. He was thrown from the car in the resulting accident, but his left arm was severed by a seat belt. The rest of the band, in the middle of making an album, did not appear to consider that they might not want a one-armed drummer. They sat Rick in a room for eight hours a day, and he learned to play again using a series of foot pedals. He tells his story to Lynn Redgrave as part of the series in which well-known people talk about coping with ill health. "It was a matter of using all the information in my mind and channelling it through a different limb," he says, before demonstrating how to slice a tomato while holding it down with his foot. (Ceefax) (s) (242)

6.00 Star Trek

CHOICE: Not just any old Star Trek, but the very first episode in which the USS Enterprise began to boldly go where no man had gone before. This pilot, The Cage, was made in 1964 but was initially rejected on the grounds of cost — $630,000 per programme. Station heads changed their minds two years later and launched the series which lasted 21 years. Mr Spock, whose order 'Check the circuits" is the first line of the entire senes, is on the bridge, but he is the only familiar face. The Enterprise's commander, Captain Christopher Pike, is played by Jeffrey Hunter, who was committed to a film when the second episode was made. In The Cage, Captain Pike is captured by a highly intelligent race who can create the power of illusion. Can the crew of the Enterprise rescue him? (77600)

 CHOICE: Two films made by recent film school graduates. Resurrection, directed by Ray Kilby of the Royal College of Art, is a cross between Joe Orton and Alan Bennett. Two Welsh old maids are looking forward to their sister's funeral when she has the effrontery to wake up. The undertaker refuses to cancel the funeral, and the sisters face social disgrace. Tuning In, directed by Elaine Streeter of the National Film and Television School, is more poignant. An estranged couple by chance tune into the same radio concert. He is at home, she is driving through darkness. For both of them it brings back memories. A little slower than Resurrection, but with a sad twist at the end (s) (21987)

CHOICE: A season of drama-tiocumentaries about largely unchronicled deeds of heroism begins with a real corker. "Dr Barry" was a woman who posed as a man during a lifetime of medical service in the British army and colonial administration in the last century. It is a story of beneficent and fearless deception so remarkable that it deserves to be shouted from the rooftops. Recovery depends on consumer spending

Bank expects recession to continue

BY ANATOLE KALETSKY, ECONOMICS EDITOR

THE British economy is still bumping along the bottom of recession and will probably continue to do so for the foreseeable future, according to the Bank of England.

Although there should be some increase in gross domestic product in the second half of the year, the Bank argued yesterday in its Quarterly Bul-letin that the recovery would be weak and any significant improvement would depend on consumers and homeowners deciding they had suffi-ciently reduced their debt burdens. The timing of any such turnaround in sentiment was impossible to predict, the publication coincided with another gloomy set of official figures, this time on the public Sector borrowing requirement. The government borrowed £526 million in July. traditionally a month when public finances are in surplus, and the PSBR for the first four months of the financial year increased to £11.3 billion. Bank said that the weakness of the American recovery and the economic downturns in Japan and Germany had contributed to Britain's economic problems. But it said that the main constraint on growth was low consumer demand. In contrast to the last two recessions, when personal consumption had held up far better than other elements of demand, the present recession had seen an unprecedented fall in consumer spending. But despite their attempts to save money, consumers had only had "limited success" in cutting back their debts, the Bank said.

Apart from the passage of time, there was only one other way of alleviating excessive debt burdens. This would be through an unexpected burst of inflation, a possibility the government's policy had been designed to avoid.

Comparing the economic situation to the one three months ago, the Bank noted that many of the latest "back-ward looking" statistics had strengthened somewhat, but that the leading indicators of future economic changes, such as surveys of business confidence, had shown a downturn in the last two months.

The outlook remains very uncertain but slow growth in the economy should be evident during the remainder of this year," the Quarterly Bul-letin said. "The post-election recovery in consumer demand has proved fragile with no clear signs as yet that demand is moving above last year's depressed level. The prospects for growth in the short run spending. But consumer spending remains flat." In trying to account for the weakness of consumer spending, the Bank emphasised the collapse of the housing mar-ket. But it also identified the decline in pay settlements, a central objective of government policy, as one of the factors dampening growth in the short term. The Bank said: "The process of adjustment to a low inflation environment may have altered individuals' expectations about the rate at which debt is likely to be eroded by inflation, and the rate at which wage increases will enable households to outgrow their existing debt."

In a separate announce-ment, the Bank said it would auction £2.5 billion of Trea-sury 834 per cent stock due in 2017 on August 26. The stock was trading unchanged from its previous close at 98-20 after the auction announcement.

Poor earnings outlook forces Sedgwick to halve dividend

By Jonathan Prynn, insurance correspondent

market took fright at a pessimistic statement on industry prospects from Sedgwick Group, Britain's biggest broker, which announced its interim results. No broking stocks escaped the bloodbath but Sedgwick shares fell most heavily, losing 24 per cent of their value to close at 110p.

The company said it was cutting its interim dividend from 4p to 3p and that it anticipates paying a final dividend of "not less than 3p" making a total of 6p for the year, half the level of payout it has been making since 1986.

David Rowland, the chairman of Sedgwick and probably, from January, the next chairman of Lloyd's, said the decision to cut the dividend had been taken because there was little prospect of earnings returning to the 1986 level for the forseeable future, and because of the need to conserve cash for investment. "If our present level of distribution is maintained, this will weaken the ability of the group to develop its business in the future," Mr Rowland said. The halving of the dividend will save the company £25 million a year, allowing it to increase its investment in information technology and business development. Mr Rowland said: "It is the group's intention to increase the dividend from this level as soon as the group's financial performance justifies it." Sax Riley, Sedgwick's newly appointed chief executive, said he could see no sign of the downturn in the insurance industry coming to an end during the course of next year. 'I have no doubt the industry is going through the same Big

Abu Dhabi says BCCI auditor had conflict of interest

BANKING CORRESPONDENT

ABU Dhabi has complained bitterly to Lord Justice Bingham's inquiry on the collapse of the Bank of Credit and Commerce International about the conflicts of interest it believes there were at Price

Waterhouse, BCCI's auditor. Ahmed Al Sayegh, a member of Abu Dhabi's steering committee on BCCI, said his government is still committed to suing PW and others who it believes failed to carry out their responsibilities. Mr Al Sayegh said that PW was acting in BCCI in at least four capacities and failed to tell the Abu Dhabi government that it was preparing a report for the Bank of England last year, which led to its closure. The complaints are included in the Bingham report, due to be published by the Treasury next month. "PW was advising us on the restructuring, they were work-ing on our investigating body, they were the bank's auditors and they were reporting to the Bank of England without telling us. If that is not a conflict of interest 1 do not know what is," he said.

The Abu Dhabi government, BCCI's 77 per cent shareholder, will take charge of any legal action against BCCI's professional advisers if the proposed $3 billion compensation plan is approved. Mr Al Sayegh stressed that the government will take up the action vigorously.

A PW spokesman said later: "We had no conflicts of inter-est in any of the work we did. All parties concerned were aware of every aspect of our involvement and raised no objection at the time."

Mr Al-Sayegh was visiting London to promote the compensation scheme on which BCC1 creditors are being asked to vote. "We believe the agreement is fair and we hope the depositors will feel the same. We did not run away from BCCI, even though the argument to do that was attractive. The suffering of depositors was always at the forefront of our thinking," he

A number of BCCI creditors have criticised the current scheme, however, and believe the Abu Dhabi government should increase its $1.7 billion

Personal bankruptcies soar to record levels, says KPMG

BY NEIL BENNETT, BANKING CORRESPONDENT

THE number of personal bankruptcies has soared to record levels due to rising unemployment and contin-uing high interest rates, ac-cording to figures from KPMG Peat Marwick.

The recession is also taking a devastating toll of small businesses, with Peat recording a record level of compulsory and creditors' voluntary liquidations. Bankruptcies rose to 16,180 in the first half of the year, 30 per cent higher than a year ago. The figure is the highest since Peat began gains on the stock market.

Analysts await with a degree of trepidation the announcement on August 28 of a promised supplementary budget, while politicians and busesurests continue to become its records in 1988. The one sign of hope was that total bankruptcies fell in the second quarter from the reaucrats continue to haggle over the size, content and timing of that long-awaited first quarter, from 8,389 to fiscal package, uncertainty over which is thought to have 7,791. Tim Hayward, head of corporate recovery at Peat. been highly damaging to the said that people should not stock market read too much into the dedine. "The overall level still gives cause for concern. With economic recovery still merely a hope for some time in the future, I fear there are many

liquidations rose 11 per cent in the first half to 12,014. Compulsory and creditors' vol-untary liquidations are usually suffered by smaller compan-ies, since larger businesses are first placed into receivership. Unlike personal bankruptcies, however, the number of liquidations appears to have almost levelled off at the high point it reached at the start of last year. In the first quarter of 1991 there were 3,323 liquidations. In the second quarter of this year, the figure rose marginally to 3,370.

The South East continues to be the worst affected, and accounted for 3,968 of the 6,786 of the creditors' volun-tary liquidations in the half year. The Midlands is the second most badly hit area. with 889 creditors' voluntary liquidations. The level of liquidations is a principal cause for the heavy bad debt provisions that are being suffered by the high street banks. There was a small fall in liquidation totals in the second quarter compared with the first. Peat stressed, however, that it was meaningless to look at one quarter in isolation and that the numbers are still far higher than a year ago.

A SHARP reduction in interest payable and a non-recurrence of exceptional items sent pre-tax profits at Quicks Group, the motor dealer, ahead from £310,000 to £1.11 million in the first half to end-June. The interim dividend is raised from 1p to 1.75p.

Alec Murray, the managing director, who joined Quicks in October, said each of the divisions had so far performed better than budget. Turnover fell by 7.5 per cent to £99.4 million. Operating profits were little changed at £2.01 million, but the interest bill fell from £1.32 million to £897,000 and there was no exceptional item, against a £370,000 loss last time from bad and doubtful debts in respect of the leasing and contract hire business.

Unions delay Black's Daily News purchase

NEGOTIATIONS with the unions are holding up the attempt by Conrad Black, the Canadian newspaper owner, to buy the New York Daily News from the remains of the Maxwell empire. American Publishing, the main US subsidiary of Mr Black's holding company Hollinger, has conditionally agreed to pay about $22 million and take on liabilities of up to $8 million. The agreement includes early retirement programmes and capital improvements that could take the initial investment up to $75 million.

Agreement on collective bargaining is the main stumbling block for Mr Black. He also needs approval of the bankruptcy court, Daily News creditors and US regulators.

Kalon claims 9.7%

MANDERS' share price lost a further 10p to 189p as Kalon, the bidding group, said it had received acceptances totalling 9.7 per cent and Manders said it had received indications from nearly 34 per cent of its shareholders that they will definitely not accept. Kalon, whose offer closes on Friday, said its terms value Manders at 2422 p a share, of which 50p is in cash, based on a middle market price of 82 2 p a Kalon share, and urges Manders shareholders to "accept without delay". Manders replies that the British Steel Pension Fund, holder of 22 per cent, and other shareholders accounting for a further 11.6 per cent, have decided not to accept.

Fall at Gold Fields

GOLD Fields of South Africa, the mining group that has the lowest costing gold mines in South Africa, managed an attributable net profit of R302 million (£56.7 million) in the year ended June 30, against R314 million last time, from which a maintained total dividend of 200 cents is declared. Three gold mines in the group — Kloof, Libanon and Venterspost — are in the process of a scheme of arrangement whereby operations will be integrated. An integration will overcome Kloon's water pumping problems, bring tax advantages and allow continued mining at Libanon and, to a limited extent, at Venterspost.

Brabant slips into red

PRODUCTION difficulties at the Claymore oilfield pushed Brabant Resources into the red in the half-year to June. The oil producer lost £205,000 before tax, compared with a profit of £33,000 a year earlier, and the interim dividend is passed. Equipment failures, which Brabant says have been rectified, caused a 7 per cent fall in revenue to £1.2 million.

Brabant has bought a package of producing assets from Monument Oil & Gas for £2.5 million and has agreed in principle to sell its share of Guinevere and Lancelot gas to Mobil at a "favourable" price.

Pifco profits slip

RUSSELL Hobbs, the kettle maker that was losing £1.5 million a year as part of Polly Peck, is close to break even and should make a profit in the 12 months to end of April. Hobbs was bought in April 1991 by Pifco, which made pre-tax pro-fits of £1.2 million for 1991-2, down from £3.7 million. The final dividend of 4.25p makes an unchanged total of 7.75p. Michael Webber, chairman, said, the profits were "a creditable achievement in the light of the acquisition of Russell Hobbs and the general downturn in consumer spending".

Bedford cuts losses

A WARNING of more business closures is made by William Bedford, the antiques dealer, which says that the poor outlook for the second half of this year and no signs of recovery make the payment of any dividend extremely unlikely. The interim loss was cut from £76,018 last year to £21,731 in the six months to June. There is again no interim dividend. John Bedford, chairman, said: "Overall it is apparent that there is a substantial over capacity within the fine art and antiques trade for the volume of business available."

Embattled Sedgwick marches insurers down the hill

DAVID Rowland, the chair-man of Sedgwick Group and almost certainly the next chairman of Lloyd's, is one of those naturally upbeat char-acters who could usher in Armageddon with a twinkle in his eye. But the stock market does not buy on charm and the entire insurance broking sector took a bath yesterday on Sedgwick's depressed interim results, reduced dividend and grim outlook statement.

The 25 per cent cut in the dividend, to 3p. was no great surprise, given that the company's distribution has been either uncovered or only just covered by earnings for the past four years. Most analysts agreed with Sedgwick's view that a dividend level set in the mid-1980s is no longer sustainable in an industry going through painful restructuring.
A promised 6p dividend

for the full year looks repeatable for the foresecable future, so the shares have the security of a 7 per cent yield.
That will be a relief to those who have bought Sedgwick shares this year. They have seen them slide from 237p in May to 110p yesterday. In profit terms, the pain set in during the second quarter, when River Thames Insurance, an associate company in which Sedgwick has a 49 per cent stake, fell into loss and brokerage and fee income slid 4 per cent. The situation has not been helped by falling interest income and the dollar-sterling exchange rate. Analysts do not think conditions are likely to improve in the second half. Premium rates are still falling in America and client companies are looking for savings in their insurance budgets. Profits for the year will inch ahead to about £60 million, less than half their peak in 1986. At that level, the shares are priced at about 13 times prospective earnings of 8.5p. There is little upside in prospect but Sedgwick's tough decision on the dividend should limit further falls in the share price. This is not the time to sell.

pause in issuing paper is likely to let net earnings grow in line with profits. Yesterday's market rethink about 1992 profits saw the shares 14p down at 174p. After 1991's actual outcome of £23.7 million pre-tax, 1992 profits of around £31.7 million, rather than £34 million, are likely, to put the shares on 16 times prospecbe a very useful kick to earnings in 1994, by when, perhaps, chemical markets will be healthler in their own right. Hold on.

that, although loyal to its base in Newbury, Berkshire, is fast becoming American in all but name. Forty-five per cent of the company's shares are held across the Atlantic, helped by a successful ADR listing on Nasdaq, and three ously volatile.

quarters of its business is conducted in dollars. It is hardly surprising, therefore, that the shares have tended to attract a rating that is more common for a whizekid American software house than in the more staid Brit-ish computer industry. Micro Focus has recognised this increasing bias by presenting its figures, for the first time, in dollars first. Halfway profits before tax to July 31 advanced from $15.5 million to $17.2 million and were accompanied by a confident statement on the second half, which will see the benefit of new products announced in May. The company does not pay dividends.

The shares have veered wildly. In February they reached a high of £23.75, at which point jitters over the sustainability of such levels sent them into a nosedive, to a low of £14.53 before yesterday's figures. Recent bad news from American rivals contributed to the unsettled forward multiple of 15.7. Good value, given the company's ability to outpace its rivals, but be warned: software companies, particularly American ones, are notori-

Weak demand halts Impala expansion

By COLIN CAMPBELL, MINING CORRESPONDENT

the world's second-largest platinum metals group and a fellow shareholder with Lonrho in certain South African platinum mines, is defer-ring expansion plans because of weak demand, and cutting its final dividend from 195 South African cents to 115 cents a share, making 170 cents (275 cents) for the year ended June.

Impala says industrial un-rest at operations in Bophuthatswana, compounded by technical problems and weak markets, due to higher sales by producers in the Commonwealth of Indepen-dent States, made 1992 a difficult year.

Attributable net profit fell from R312 million to R260 million (£49 million), and the group says that it will be difficult this year to improve on the 1992 results. Capital expenditure will not now exceed R250 million in IMPALA Platinum Holdings, million spent in the year ended June, and the targeted production level of 1.29 million ounces will not be reached before 1997, Impala adds.

Two years ago, the group had planned to raise production from 1.1 million ounces to 1.35 million ounces by 1995. Since then, platinum and rhodium prices have weakened, and "they may take some time to recover".

Impala holds 27 per cent of Western Platinum and Eastern Platinum, members of the Lonrho group which holds 73 per cent of both companies. and admits it is aware of speculation that a greater equity stake for Impala in these companies is in the offing.

"Such speculation is unwarranted and the status quo of our 27 per cent shareholding. with its pre-emptive rights. remains," Impala says.

Without firmer platinum group metal prices, Impala says the current year is also 1993, compared with R410 expected to be difficult.

BRITISH FUNDS

GOVERNMENT securities traded in a narrow range. with very little activity. The market had no clear direction with no real influence from European bond markets.

There were no real shocks from the PSBR figures for July, with the numbers pretty much in line with expectations. The details of the latest gilt auction were also pretty much as expected. The market had anticipated that the new issue would raise between £2 billion and E3 billion. As expected, the Bank of England will issue a £2.5 billion tranche of ultra-long stock comprising of Treasury 84 per cent 2017.

The gilt future eased a few ticks to E9720/32, on volume of 22.000 contracts, although it dipped another four ticks in after hours trading. Fears on sterling saw the shorts fare a little bit worse than the longs.

Japan resorts to desperate moves

he freefall of the Tokyo stock market has finally begun to rattle the Japanese government. Yesterday's hastily-arranged news conference by Tsutomu Hata, the finance minister, after the Nikkei latest plunge, suggests the authorities are putting together a massive financial and economic package to reawaken confidence in the country's banking system and halt the decline. For most of the year, the Nikkei and Japan's banks have been caught in a vicious circle. As share prices fall, the value of the banks' equity portfolios decline. This puts pressure on the banks' capital and profits and damages confidence in their future that is expressed by further stock market falls.

The situation is now becoming desperate. Yes-terday's 620-point fall in the Nikkei, to 14,309. means that several banks have completely exhausted the unrealised profits on their share portfolios and will soon be forced to start writing off losses. This could not come at a worse time for the banks, which are already being forced to make heavy bad debt provisions on property loans. Mr Hata wants to provide the banks with the tools to reverse this circle. Reports in Tokyo suggest the authorities are thinking of establishing a fund of up to Y5,000 billion (£20.7 billion) to buy real estate from the lenders funded by national and local government. If only the British government had funds of that magnitude to stimulate the economy.

This sort of property buy-back would leave the authorities with millions of sq ft of unwanted office space in Tokyo and Osaka, but it would alleviate the pressure on the banks' balance sheets. When combined with an initiative to securitise smaller company loans and sell them to Japanese insurance companies and another cut in the discount rate to boost profits, the immediate future of the lenders would look decidedly rosier, and could spur a recovery in the Nikkei. From these depths, the return of such a virtuous circle may seem an impossible dream. One thing is certain: traders everywhere are poised waiting for a turn in the Tokyo market.

ank of England economists, who are somewhat more laid back about such matters than Treasury ministers, have tired of looking for the recovery and virtually given up the desperate search to identify green shoots. A full year after the Bank's quarterly bulletin first used that graphic phrase about the economy bumping along the bottom, it is still bumping. The jesting prediction by Bill Martin, chief economist at Phillips & Drew, that the recovery would be L-shaped, has become statistical reality. There will eventually be a meaningful upturn, the Bank thinks, but it is not worth dropping whatever you happen to be doing to wait for it, even if output turns out to be slightly higher in the second half of the year than in the first.

There is much sense in this, but also some complacency. It is predicted on the apparently comforting thought that, though things are not evidently getting better, they are no longer getting worse. That may be true in a macroeconomic sense, but is freezing cold comfort to most businesses. In factories and boardrooms, the longer demand remains at depressed levels, the more likely the bank is to call in its loans and the receiver to knock at the door, the more likely factories will be closed, investment cut back and core jobs shed. So far, industry has chiefly reacted to recession and the ERM discipline by cutting costs, which will set exporters and those who compete with imports in good stead for an increase in demand. The longer recession goes on, the more companies that will have to adjust by making permanent cuts in capacity. . .

high street banks plan

collective memory

enounced by customers, shunned by investors and blasted by economic reality, the only place banks can go from here is up. The half-year figures from the lenders, the billions of pounds of bad debts and thou-sands of job cuts, were a graphic reminder of the task they face to rebuild their business.

The banking industry is undergo-ing a fundamental upheaval. Lend-ers that once seemed to be indestructible pillars of the world economy have been so battered by intense competition and massive had loans in the past decade that they are rethinking their entire business.

The industry has certainly suffered in previous recessions, but this is uncharted territory. Bad debt provisions are more than twice as high as they have ever been, with Barclays struggling under a non-performing loan portfolio worth £5.5 billion. Banking once guaranteed a job for life but for up to 30,000 people this year it will offer a one-way trip to redundancy or early retirement.

These are merely the most striking indications of the challenges and the changes that reach to the heart of the banking business. For decades the banks have attracted savings from individuals and lent them to cashhungry companies, and benefited from the margin. A simple process that brought enormous profits.

The operation was all the more lucrative since personal customers allowed the banks to use their money interest-free, the so-called endowment effect. Pressure from building societies forced the banks to offer interest-bearing current accounts four years ago, but even today Bardays controls £6.3 billion in interest-free deposits, generating more than £600 million a year.

Revenues from retail banking combined with relentless consolidation created the financial behemoths that dominate every high street. They also fuelled the global ambitions of many lenders and led to the Latin American debt crisis and disastrous overseas acquisitions, such as Midland's

Brian Pitman, chief executive of Lloyds, believes the time when banks could count on domestic markets to guarantee profits has gone. "In the old days, the retail business was so profitable it could paper over all the cracks. It was possible for a bank to buy something overseas because it looked nice and the retail bank would pay for it. That cross-subsidisation is being removed," he said.

Interest-bearing current accounts are only one of the factors eroding the banks' traditional business. Large companies are increasingly raising funds from institutional investors through private placings, while individuals are investing directly in the money markets. This "disintermediation" is robbing banks of customers. The other pressure on the banks is the increasing sophistication of financial markets, both in products and customer demands. The days when the local bank manager could service the needs of private and business clients have disappeared. Today, he would have to be a master of life assurance, pensions, unit trusts and mortgages for personal customers and a battery of products for the small business market, including currency hedges, interest rate caps, collars, swaps and options.

The trend has prompted many banks to sub-divide their business and train staff to specialise. Mr Pitman said: "We find it difficult to compete against specialists and they continue to pick business off. We are moving into a world of increasing segmentation and I cannot see that rend beine re

Most hankers rubbish the grand concepts of universal banking which were vaunted in the early eighties. Specialisation will force banks to sell or close many of their underperforming businesses, a process that is already underway and likely to accelerate when economic recovery encourages acquisitions. By concentrating and investing in a few products and a narrower range of customers, banks will be able to improve service, reduce costs and prices and innovate more rapidly. Derek Wanless, the new chief executive of National Westminster, agrees that banks will focus on fewer businesses and customers in future. "Banks will certainly be more careful about choosing markets than in the past, but that does not mean they will come down to a very small range of operations. There is a degree of balance about how many markets can be managed by an organisation. The concept of being all things to all men is virtually dead," he said.

The other key to any bank's success is risk. The basic commodity of banking is not money but risk, whether it is the risk of lending, trading in financial markets or merely the risk of mistakes by employees. Institutions must price products and services to take account of risk or they will make losses.

As financial markets have grown more sophisticated however, banks have found it increasingly difficult to assess the risks in their businesses. often with disastrous consequences.
Three years ago, Midland Bank taking in its treasury book. As a result it suffered an interest rate mismatch which cost more than £300 million. More recently, Standard Chartered did not assess the risks of dealing in the Bombay stockmarket and it has been forced to provide £100 million for ten years to allow us to judge them on past performance," Mr Wanless said. "In the eighties banks had a single view of future world growth. So their risk assessment in the broadest sense was not good enough."

Some bankers are now terrified about the potential risks in trading complex derivative products, such as futures and options where a massive trading position can lie concealed until it is too late.

Many banks are adopting computer-driven formulae to judge the risks in their businesses and products. The results are likely to persuade them to sell or close some operations and concentrate on areas offering the highest risk-reward profile.

ne institution presenting a powerful argument for specialisation is Bankers Trust in America. The bank was criticised in the late seventies when it sold its retail network, while rival institutions were diversifying and acquiring as fast as they could. With hindsight, the bank's decision to concentrate on the corporate and institutional market are struggling to sell businesses and raise the capital to fund others, Bankers Trust pushes its income ever higher, to $667 million last year.

The bank is driving towards further specialisation. The loan book has fallen from its $29 billion peak in 1986 to $17 billion in order to reduce lending to a bare minimum. Bankers Trust prefers a specialist fee-based advisory service for businesses, and to syndicate loans among other banks.

There is no parallel to Bankers Trust's single-minded approach in Britain, but several institutions are concentrating on specialised markets with considerable success. Lloyds has focused on the retail market, and become the most profitable bank in Britain. "The retail business is a great business and we are good at it," Mr Pitman said. Abbey National too remais concentrated on retail savings and mortgages.

Even the larger banks have taken steps to specialise. Both Barclays and NatWest are restructuring themselves, and both are creating a division which caters for the corporate and institutional markets. BZW division contains all Barclays' trading operations as well as asset manage ment and corporate finance. Nat-West Markets goes one step further and includes large company lending. While companies and individuals may not always need a bank's balance sheet they will always need expert financial advice and be willing to pay for it. "Some companies are now financially stronger than the banks, so it is only natural they are still a role for banks in advisory work. Corporations will look to people from outside to provide them with ideas," Mr Wanless said.

Reports of the death of the banking industry have been mildly exaggerated. But the carnage in the financial world over the last two years has taught bankers that their employers are not celestial institutions, impervious to the outside world. A bank is as vulnerable to market pressure as any industrial company. The winners in the financial world will be tightly focused businesses which deliver the best services and products to their customers at the best price.

TERRY Smith, the suspended £325,000-a-year UBS Phillips & Drew analyst, stands to make £16,000 from the 11,500 copies of his controversial book Accounting for Growth sold thus far. His publisher, Random House, which brought forward publication by a month, with paperback versions going into the shops yesterday, has already ordered a re-print as demand exceeded expectations. "Yes, it has amazed us," says Susan West, editorial director for business books. "We always thought it would be a strong book and capture people's imagination but we certainly underestimated it. We thought it would only sell to institutional readers but it has proved so newsworthy that we now hope to sell it to every stockbroker in the City." Smith, due to sign copies at Broadgate today, and Waterstone's on Friday, will put in an additional signing appearance at Harrods tomorrow at the personal invitation of Mohammed Fayed, a venue he will share this autumn with such literary greats as PD James, Dick Frances and Stephen Fry. Harrods spokes-man Michael Cole admits that Fayed may have had more than pure commercial motivation for extending such an invitation. "We did notice that Lonrho was identified as employing six of the accounting

says. "Mr Fayed was surprised that it wasn't higher." Cole adds that in 1990 Lourho, auditor, KPMG, £3.2 million in fees, compared with the £6.5 million BP paid Ernst & Young, even though its humover, at £26 billion, was eight times larger.

Summer's lease THE freehold and headlease of the historic island site at the centre of Covent Garden - the old flower and fruit market has been put up for sale by GRE, the insurance giant. The property, comprising almost 100,000 sq ft of buildings, mostly Grade II listed and including the London Transport Museum, the Theatre Museum, Penhaligons and Rumours Cafe yields more than £1 million a year in rental income and is expected to fetch about £12 million. Chartered surveyor Conrad Rithlat & Co. appointed to market the site, has discovered that instead of a peppercorn rent from the tennant - the Covent Garden Area Trust any new landlord can look forward to receiving, once a year, turnover £3.3 billion, paid its "a posy of flowers and one red apple". "Peppercorn rents are usually only payable on de-mand and we forgot to ask for it this year but we have received it in the past," says Didier Tandy, GRE's development surveyor. Adding further to the romantic intrigue Tandy reveals that the date that the posy and apple are payable is June 3 and explains that that date was chosen because it was the birthday of one Sylvia Mander, a GLC and then LRB solicitor for more than 20 years, who worked on the project.

Family fortunes

CHRISTOPHER Edge, one time head of research at British & Commonwealth's investment subsidiary Stock Group, and, since March, investment director of Family Assurance, Britain's biggest tax-exempt friendly society - with £500 million under management has made his first professional appointment. He has poached Andrew Killean, aged 29, from Brown Shipley. Killean, a European fund manager, started at Family this week but will not be there for long. He leaves this weekend for a twoweek trip to Barbados, where he will, as Edge puts it "sign a major international agreement." Killean is going there to get married before returning to Scotland for the reception. Edge's nine strong team will be reduced, temporarily to seven - Henrietta Lyon. daughter of ex-County man Jetemy Lyon, is also on honeymoon, having wed Mark Bradshaw, of rival firm, Mer-

Banks' greed depresses borrowing

From G.B. Miller Sir, It has been said that the consumer has no confidence in the future of the economy and is paying off his debts instead of borrowing for new spending. This is probably true. However, there may be another reason.

I have today, by pure coincidence, received my monthly statements of account from the National Westminster Bank and from the Deutsche Bank in Neuss, Germany. Each bank sent me details of their latest overdraft rates.

The NatWest charges 23.2 per cent effective annual rate for approved overdrafts and 37.6 per cent for "unar-ranged" overdrafts, whereas the Deutsche Bank charges 15.25 per cent per annum (16.5 per cent effective annual rate) for approved overdrafts and 18.25 per cent (20 per

Bearing in mind that the bank rates in the two countries differ by only 0.25 per cent, one wonders why the British bank should charge approximately 8 per cent more for an agreed overdraft and 16.5 per cent more for an unarranged overdraft than a German hank.

Sir, Mr S.A. Ettinger's letter (Business Times, August 13) recording his worries as guarantor of a lease where the rent has been increased at review to a figure far beyond his wildest nightmare, reveals only the tip of the iceberg.

'Clear' leases are skewed in favour of the landlord of inherent defects in the (which, regrettably, it too often

From Mr M.D.T. Evans structure. If the tenant rented only part of a building, he was required to contribute a stated proportion of all these expenses.

Leases of this kind were called "clear" leases - the rent receivable by the landlord was clear of all expense to him. Many solicitors keep them on their word processors, and even in the present slump, prospective tenants are asked to accept them.

It is not difficult to work out a fair and reasonable balance of responsibilities between a landlord and tenant, Leases. however, are always drafted by landlords' solicitors.

The "standard form" clear lease is run off from the wordprocessor, and either the tenant signs it because he thinks it is the normal thing to do

'Never-never' morals

From M.G. de St V. Atkins Sir, The large increase, in the three months to June, of the amount of money repaid to lenders appears to be regarded by our financial wizards as a sign of reprehensible economic conditions - and, no doubt. in terms of modern morality. of inexpiable turpitude as well.

I always suspected that the term "never-never", applied to the means of obtaining goods used by persons with nothing but promises to offer in exchange, had a close semantic relation to the term applied to the world of improbability. How right I appear to have been.

From Mr John Breining-Riches Sir. Further to Mr S.A. Ettinger's letter (Caveat Emptor, August 13) -how many other tenants in his position, guaranteeing the rent payments of his own company, lasts the length of the lease? Should any third party, acquiring the lease, fail to pay rent etc, the landlord can look to the original tenant for settlement. In my experience, this is another facet of the law rarely mentioned to the tenant

First Victory on handy Ebor mark

RICHARD Hannon, enjoy-ing a marvellous season, can extend his lead at the top of the trainers' championship by winning two of the big three races at York today with First Victory in the Tote Ebor and Son Pardo in the Scottish Equitable Gimerack Stakes. First Victory has run well in the last two renewals of the Tote Ebor, finishing fourth to Further Flight in 1990 and sixth behind Deposki 12 months ago.

The difference this season is that First Victory has been prepared all season with this race very much in mind whereas in previous years he has come here after running well in a number of good staying handicaps.

First Victory failed to win last season but ran some outstanding races off big weights in defeat, finishing third in both the Bessborough Stakes at Royal Ascot and the Northumberland Plate at Newcastle. The six-year-old can now race off a mark of 88, 9lb lower than 12 months ago. and has had two gentle pipe-openers to put him right for his main objective. Deposki has clearly been trained with a repeat bid in mind but First Victory has a 13lb pull for ten lengths (after weight for age) with Michael (1989) and River Falls (1991). weight for age) with Michael Stoute's four-year-old and Frankie Dettori is unlikely to be allowed to steal a march on his rivals as Francis Norion did 12 months ago.

Dangers abound, with Itqan, from a stable returning to its best, and Holy Zeal, third two years ago, two lively outsiders. However, First Victory is a sporting nap to make it third time lucky. Son Pardo, who made an

5.15 FALMOUTH HANDICAP (3-Y-O: £11,160: 5f) (13 runners)

Drawn nine of nine for the Heinz 57 Phoenix Stakes at Leopardstown, Son Pardo was one of three runners to race on the far side there, the trio finishing tailed off behind the sextet on the stands side her unbeaten run to five and

That run can be safely ignored and indeed the eventual winner, stable companion Pips Pride, actually franked the form of Son Pardo's previous run in the Richmond Stakes at Goodwood, where my selection had Pips Pride back in fifth.

Goodwood, looks held, even on 51b better terms, and bigger dangers may be Coventry Stakes winner Petardia and Norfolk Stakes runner-up Silver Wizard, who will appre ciate this extra furlong. User Friendly can extend gain her third consecutive group one success by outstaying her seven rivals in the Aston Upthorpe Yorkshire Oaks Bill Gredley's resolute gal-loper, who will relish the long York straight, may have most to fear from the Michael Stoute-trained pair, Niodini and Bineyah. The latter showed much improved form to finish fourth to User Friendly at the Curragh. He De Chypre, who won the Juddmonte International at this meeting three years ago. can show he is no back number by defying top weight in the Andy Capp Handicap.

Guy Harwood's seven-yearold has run creditably in three group races this season since returning from the United States and will prove hard to catch despite his welter burden.

Bonny Scot underlines his Doncaster classic claims

By MICHAEL SEELY

The second and third will renew rivalry with Bonny Scot on Town Moor, "Assessor ran well enough but he needs a much stronger gallop." Richard Hannon said. "Let's hope

he gets it at Doncaster."

BONNY Scot stamped himself as a potential winner of the St Leger with an authoritative victory in the Great Voltigeur Stakes at York

Ridden with style and confidence by Frankie Dettori, the 11-8 lavourite mastered Somus entering the last furlong and went clear to win by one and a half lengths.

Assessor, making his comeback after a disappointing performance in the Derby, finished a further two-and-ahalf lengths away third. In 1984, Luca Cumani, yesterday's winning trainer, captured the final classic with Commanche Run, the sire of Bonny Scot. "He reminds me a lot of his father," Cumani said. "Both physically and in the way he's suddenly starting to come to himself in the second half of the season."

Having been narrowly beaten by Rain Rider at Newmarket, Lord Weinstock's homebred colt won the Gordon Stakes at Goodwood on his last start.

Eddery. "He is lame and "He's suddenly starting to work and race like a good horse," Cumani added. "This we've had to give him a painkilling injection," Barry Hills, his trainer, said. "We don't race would have put him spot know what's wrong yet." on for Doncaster."

Hills enjoyed better fortune when his son, Michael, partnered Further Flight to an easy win over Landowner in the Lonsdale Stakes.

"He won it in a matter of strides and then pricked his cars," said the trainer. "I wish he was in the Ebor tomorrow as he had such an easy race. He'll now either go for the Doncaster Cup or the Irish St

Other well-backed winners were Woodchat, who gave Paul Cole his 29th two-yearold winner of the season in the Deploy Acomb Stakes and Daru, the 5-1 favourite, in the Racecall Melrose Handicap. Daru was repaying a debt to Steve Cauthen on his first day back from a ten-day riding suspension. The grey was one of the two horses to land Cauthen in hot water over his use of the whip at Goodwood three weeks ago.

Leading Ebor fancies eliminated

FIVE of the leading contenders for today's £100,000-added Tote Ebor at York were eliminated at yesterday's overnight declaration stage. With a safety limit of 22 for the race, there were 11 elimi-nations including Turgenev, Mull House, Aude La Belle, Barrish and Legion Of Honour.

Turgenev, installed favourite when the Ebor weights were published, is now likely to tackle tomorrow's Ladbroke Knavesmire Handicap over one-and-a-half miles.

BY GORDON ALIAN JEFF Rabkin, a South African who plays for Israel, preserved his unbeaten record in his section of the Woolwich world championship singles when he wore down Bill Moseley, of South Africa, 25-12 at Worthing yesterday.

Moseley uses what is known as the South African clinic delivery: a fixed stance, semi-upright, on the mat, which its proponents say is the simplest and best style. It has served him well this week, helping him to beat the three Com-monwealth Games medal-winners, Richard Corsie, Rob

Parrella and Mark McMa-

bon. He recovered from a losing position against Corsie on Sunday and did the same against McMahon yesterday. McMahon led 22-14 and

big lead but kept it, getting close with his first bowls and

victories, while Peter Belliss, of

New Zealand, the 1984 cham-

Seam and spin end stiff resistance

Pringle and Such maintain pace of Essex title drive

COLCHESTER (first day of three; Essex won toss): Essex, with all first-innings wickets in hand, are 267 runs behind

ONE of Essex's most endearing qualities is their gift for finding unlikely heroes. On Monday it was Peter Such: yesterday Derek Pringle oined him, the pair taking four wickets apiece as the championship leaders had the better of an absorbing day.

In other counties, the future of out-grounds like Castle Park is becoming increasingly uncertain, with costs mounting and the change to four-day cricket cutting the number of fixtures. There are no such doubts in Essex, where the out-grounds are well supported, and their pitches tend to be of the "interesting" variety. For Essex virtually to sew up the championship at Colchester in the middle of August has become something of a modern tradition, from the days of Acfield and East, as the spinners came into their own on dry turning pitches. Back then the seam bowlers also made valuable contributions, and so it proved yesterday, as another good crowd turned up to enjoy the progress. For some time yesterday,

Sri Lanka move into lead

Colombo: Asanka Gurusinha and Arjuna Ranatunga shared an unbroken fourthwicket partnership of 128 as Sri Lanka took control of the first Test match against Australia here yesterday. By the end of the second day, Sri Lanka, replying to Australia's 256, had made 265 for three wickets, well placed to establish an imposing lead and set Australia the hard task of surviving on a pitch that is already encourag-

Gurusinha, playing the anchor role after the early dismissal of Hathurusinghe. scored an unbeaten 87 in 291 minutes with 13 fours. When he reached 43, he passed 1,000 runs in Test cricket. Ranatunga was the more enterprising batsman in his unbeaten innings of 69. He was severe on Warne, the leg spinner, hitting him for 29 runs in three overs, which included three sixes.

Resuming at nine without loss, Sri Lanka reached 36 before Waugh broke through for Australia in the seventeenth over, having Hathurusinghe caught at sec-ond slip by Taylor. Gurusinha and Mahanama added 92 for the second wicket, taking Sri Lanka to 128 before Waugh, in his second spell, broke through again, inducing Mahanama to edge a ball that Healy, the wicketkeeper, held on to as he dived low to

Mahanama scored 78 in 212 minutes and Australia had another success before tea when the off spinner, Matthews, trapped de Silva legbefore for six. However, that was to be Australia's only joy, as Gurusinha and Ranatunga dominated after tea. (Reuter)

Surrey appeared not to have been told that Essex's momenturn as they advance on the championship was reaching unstoppable proportions, and Lynch and Bicknell batted with some assurance. The first and last words went to the championship leaders.

Pringle, impressively for someone who had ruled him-self unfit for the England oneday squad, led the way in a sustained spell before lunch. His figures of four for 63 did not flatter him, and Ilott can rarely have bowled better for

Rain delayed the start by half an hour, and in a humid atmosphere the ball moved around and seamed, giving Surrey a difficult start. Sargeant survived two confident appeals for catches before being trapped by Pringle, and

But then Lynch, the acting captain, came in to join Darren Bicknell and the resistance began in earnest. Bicknell eventually became Pringle's third victim, an expansive stroke yielding only an edge, but in mid-afternoon, as Ilott's expressions of frustration almost got the better of considerably more than stubbatted with almost regal style. Cutting and driving imperi-ously, he hit 18 fours off 191 balls in his century, his 34th for Surrey in first-class cricket. Ward and Brown lent steady support, and at 250 for four, Surrey looked set to make Essex work hard if they were

While Surrey prospered, Such had stood ruminatively at long leg as Essex used five bowlers. After 72 overs he was finally called into action, to ironic cheers from his new fan club by the sightscreen, and the balance tilted.

Lynch, who had reached his hundred, went for a big hit, mistimed it and skied to cover. In the next over Pringle made his final contribution, getting the dangerous Brown Ibw as he pushed forward, and Essex were among the tail.

Such needed no further invitation, Still, at 28, looking like a gangly youth who has wandered on to the field by mistake, he is bowling better, and more confidently, than at any time in his career. He has taken ten wickets in the past two days; it will be surprising if the tally does not increase

Nottinghamshire counter-attack

SCARBOROUGH (first day of three; Nottinghamshire won toss): Yorkshire, with five first-innings wickets in hand, are eight runs behind Nottinghamshire

A DEPLETED Nottinghamshire side, with three successive defeats behind them, seemed once again to have faltered in their efforts to stay in the championship race yesterday when they were dismissed for 152. By the close, however. Yorkshire had been gritty, tense match looks in prospect Ironically, it was Pennett, who last year was attached to the Yorkshire cricket academy, who made the early inroads for Nottinghamshire. Two splendid yorkers accounted for Moxon and Kellett after Yorkshire had made a promising start. Then Metcalfe played across the line fatally against Hemmings before Cairns returned and claimed Tendulkar and White. In one of his last innings for Yorkshire, Tendulkar had played with typical definess and charm, his strokes including a straight six against Hemmings. Tendulkar was told at the weekend by the Indian authorities that he must return home next week to play in domestic competitions. These are being used as trials for the Indian tour to Zimbabwe and South Africa, which starts in October. Yorkshire are still hoping that Tendulkar can stay for York-

Nicholas rides his luck

By JACK BAILEY

BOURNEMOUTH (first day Hampshire have scored 341 MIDDLESEX'S long run on the outside in the County Championship Stakes suffered a double stumble yesterday. The first was courageously self-inflicted and involved the dropping of Mark Ramprakash for disciplinary reasons. The second lay with Mark Nicholas's highest score of the season and with Ayling's highest champ-ionship innings. Ayling's part-nership with Aymes added 111 in 32 overs for the seventh wicket just as Middlesex seemed to have overcome the handicap of adding four missed chances to their other The chief beneficiary was Nicholas, who gave three chances on his way to 95. You could not help feeling that he deserved a bit of luck, for he stood firm for nearly four hours while Gatting rang the bowling changes and probed incessantly with an attack which used Emburey in a pivotal role. Troubles as well as triumphs have beset the Hampshire captain this season and an elusive century would have been his due in this last match at Dean Park. Certainly, he served Hampshire well yesterday. Middleton, in unusually free vein, had fallen at 16 caught be-hind down the leg side in the day's third over and Gower, alas firm-footed, had waved fatally outside the off stump before Nicholas appeared, and only 40 runs were on the board. He reached 31 before being dropped at slip and, soon after taking 14 in an over

same bowler as Haynes spilled a chance on the mid-wicket

Nicholas was to score 11 fours as well as that six and share in profitable partner-ships of 70 with James, 48 with Cox and 60 with Marshall before Ayling and Aymes set to work. These two made batting look relatively easy. Both reached chanceless half-centuries before Ayling was well caught by Weekes at deep mid-wicket. Aymes, last out, pulled a long hop from Emburey to square leg - a ball bad enough to get him out where many good ones had failed. But it was Hampshire's day, for Middlesex looked out of sorts from the moment they stepped on to the field, thinking no doubt of absent friends. Emburey will have bowled far better for less reward than his five wickets here but the old boy does keep reeling them in.

Watkins is lifted by light wind

AS NICK Booth and his crew. all of whom have multiple scienosis, reached Lerwick last night at the end of the second stage of the Hartlepool Renaissance Round Britain race. Mike Slade and Colin Watkins were already battling it out to see who would be first to reach Hartlepool, the third stopover in this 1.860-mile circumnavigation (Barry Pick-thall writes). .The prevailing light southerly winds favour Watkins's smaller but lighter Armed Forces entry, Dump Truck, which quickly broke clear of Slade's early covering tactice and had established a 100yard lead by the time the larger, cruising maxi, Ocean Leopard, had cleared the protecting headland.

These light breezes have helped Matthew Humphries and his Youth Challenge crew to climb to within 21 minutes in the handicap listings be-hind Chris Little's leading yacht, Bounder.

Favourites such as Tom and Vicky Jackson's heavy displacement yacht. Sunstone, which had been lying second to Bounder after the first stage to Cork, fared less well in the mixed conditions.

of their best days of the summer. When Moles and Twose were putting on 111 for the first wicket in their measured way, it would not have been surprising if one or two bowlers had averted gazing at the captain. In the past week, Lancashire's coach and two senior professionals have been dismissed. An end to their dismal season cannot come quickly enough. Yet Chapple, a lively medium pacer who played for England Under-19 over the weekend, took two wickets largely through being mus-tard keen. Fitton bowled unchanged between lunch and tea and very tidily, too. As for Watkinson, alternating between quicker and slower styles as if he were a latterday Sobers, he surpassed himself. With his last two balls of his sixth over, bowling now at medium pace, he had Twose and Ostler leg before. The first ball of his next over clipped Penney's off bail, the batsman playing all round the line. It was his first hat-trick and elevated him into the company of Wasim Akram, no less, the last Lancashire cricketer to achieve this. Although Moles gamely kept up his concentration and consolidation, Warwickshire's innings never recovered. They were not helped by Paul Smith having a stomach bug and being unable to bat, but there were some unworthy shots in the afternoon session. Lloyd did not pick Watkinson's slower ball and was held at square leg. The other Smith, Neil, flayed at Chapple and was taken at the wicket.

Australia encounter stern resistance in the Friendly City

By DAVID HANDS RUGBY CORRESPONDENT IN PORT ELIZABETH

FAR from being a free-flowing celebration of rugby in what the locals call the "Friendly City", the Austra-lians found themselves conducting an exercise in damage limitation at Boet Erasmus stadium yesterday — both to their lineout and their backrow strength.

The third success of their South African tour was comfortable enough, by one goal, three tries and four penalty goals to a try and a penalty. The manner of its achievement, however, left much to be desired. Their lineout was held, a rare occurrence, their midfield lacked bite and they iost Coker at a time when the No. 8 was playing like a man who knows his international badly lacerated ear after being accidentally kicked by Scott-Young his colleague, but his availability for the game against South Africa on Saturday is not in doubt. Morgan moved into the back row and contributed effectively, both in the loose and at restarts against the team which trailed in at the bottom of the Currie

Eastern Province had hoped to have Neil Jenkins, of Pontypridd and Wales, playing for them this season until the stand-off half's dismissal, and subsequent suspension, in a Weish Cup semi-final in April. As it is, they have worked their way through five stand-offs but the fifth, Miller — a schoolboy last year - scored their try and his penalty gave Eastern Province an 8-6 lead a half-hour into the game.

He was unfortunate that his little chip led to Junee's try which began the second half and prompted an Australian recovery. In the process, Junee tour but this led to the introduction, as replacement, of Campese, to applause even greater than that which heraided the appearance of the entire Australian team at the start of the match.

But not even Campese could bring greater inspiration to his colleagues. They could never free the loose ball quickly enough and lost possession in the tackle too often for com-fort. Though they worked Kahl over after a series of forward drives, and Herbert profited from Ofahengaue's drive into untenanted areas.

Late entry: Campese, who came on as a replacement at Port Elizabeth yesterday, could not spark Australia

Fitzpatrick leads the way forward for New Zealand

WHATEVER the management of the 1993 British Isles party to New Zealand expects from the All Blacks, they can be certain that Sean Fitzpatrick will remain at the helm

Fitzpatrick, whose team returned home from South Africa earlier this week after completing nine internationals during the New Zealand union's centenary season, was hailed by his management as being on the verge of joining the elite All Blacks captains.

"If he is not quite there yet, he is a grand example of the best we have to offer in New Zealand," Earl Kirton, the All Blacks assistant coach, said after last Saunday's breathless 27-24 win over the Springboks in Johannesburg.

Kirton, part of a new selectorial team himself this year, will have greeted with enthusiasm the appointment on the weekend of Dick Best. the England coach, to the British Isles management. Best, who will join Geoff Cooke (England) and Ian McGeechan (Scotland) with the Lions, has always admitted the tremendous influence Kirton has had on him. Kirton played with and later coached Harlequins when Best was a player at the club, and Best has remained in close contact with the Wellington dentist. Next year, the two will meet as adversaries: Best as assistant to McGeechan and Kirton as assistant to Laurie Mains, assuming that the All the Irish selectors are more far-sighted than the rest of us. Certainly, if there are eight better players than McKenna in Ireland the home internationals are a foregone conclusion. England, Scotland and Wales need not turn up.

Dismal season lit up by Gross

By Robert Kirley

THE Los Angeles Dodgers have had a miserable season. Favoured to win the National League West, they languish in last place. Darryl Strawberry, their leading outfielder, has played only 38 games because of a bad back and the team is setting records for errors.

Kevin Gross provided rare relief on Monday by pitching the first no-hitter of the season in a 2-0 win over the San Francisco Giants. The right hander, 31, needed only 99 pitches, striking out six bat-ters, walking two and retiring 19 in a row until he struck Mark Leonard, a pinch hitter, leading off the ninth inning. In an era of 90mph-plus fastballs, Tim Wakefield, of the Pittsburgh Pirates, thrives with his knuckleball, which has the velocity - and the unpredictable trajectory — of a falling leaf. On Sunday the converted outfielder halted the red-hot Atlanta Braves 4-2 to improve his record to three wins and no defeats.

The Minnesota Twins, win ners of the World Series last year, have lost 13 of their last 20 games and trail the Oakland A's by five games in the American League West. Mark McGwire, of Oakland, leads the big leagues with 38 home runs, eight more than his nearest pursuer.

In the American League East, the Toronto Blue Jays split a four-game home series with the Baltimore Orioles, but the Kansas City Royals scored eight runs in the fourth inning in a 17-hit attack that beat Baltimore 15-2.

Cecil Fielder, of the Detroit Tigers, leads the major leagues with 100 runs batted in (RBI). If he wins the American League RBI title, he will be the first player to do so for three successive seasons since Babe Ruth (1919-21).

Leading clubs allay fears

THE so called "Platinum" group of seven Premier League clubs, who had reportedly negotiated their own £3million advertising deal, yesterday attempted to allay fears that they were about to divide football's top division into the haves and the havenots (Louise Taylor writes).

The seven - Arsenal, Aston Villa, Everton, Leeds United, Liverpool, Manchester United and Nottingham Forest negotiated the contract for revolving pitch perimeter advertising hoardings with Dorna, a Spanish company. The seven clubs are expect-

Blackburn end interest in buying Thomas

GEOFF Thomas expected to be in Lancashire this week, but not with Crystal Palace. Instead of signing for Blackburn Rovers, as he had hoped, the midfield player will pull on his boots for Palace in a Premier League football fixture at Oldham Athletic tonight.

Blackburn yesterday told Palace that they were no longer interested in the Manchester-born England player. Kenny Dalglish, the Rovers manager, is now be-lieved to be about to offer £3 million for Craig Short, the Notts County central defender.

Ron Noades, the Palace chairman, said: "Blackburn phoned me to withdraw their offer. Perhaps they are considering moves in other directions. All the speculation has unsettled Thomas and it is important that it ceases so he can concentrate on Palace again." Arsenal could renew their interest mature celebrations with Santa Claus will continue to con them into thinking that it really is the new year.

Noades added that his club is interested in acquiring Terry Phelan, the Wimbledon full back. "We have spoken to Wimbldon about Phelan, who is a very talented defender," he said. Wimbledon are understood to want £2 million.

That is because United do not usually start winning matches until January — a habit which prompted Bassen's latest psychological stunt. One man who hopes to be still at Bramail Lane come Christmas is Alan McLeary, the central defender on loan from Millwall, who will be relieved not to be marking Ian Rush tonight. Rush is out for ten days with a groin injury and will almost certainly be replaced by McManaman. Bruce Grobbelaar's decision to travel to Harare to play for Zimbabwe last weekend has cost him his place in goal for Liverpool, who persist with James. Jones, the England right back, returns in place of

While Everton prepared for tonight's visit to Manchester United, Pat Nevin, the Everton winger, was talking over a £400,000 transfer to Tranmere Rovers.

Manchester City will seek revenge for FA and League Cup defeats last season when they travel to newly promoted Middlesbrough, and Robert Fleck is aiming for a goal on his return to Norwich City with the Chelsea team he joined for £2.1 million last week. At Hillsborough, Nottingham Forest want to build on Sunday's defeat of Livernesday, who beat them twice last season. Brian Clough, the Forest manager, who is with-out the injured Crosby, said: "It is a match we want to win if we are to challenge for the

Queen's Park Rangers play their second fixture in three days at Southampton and Ron Atkinson has a chance to assess how good his expensively assembled Aston Villa side might be when Leeds United, the League champions, visit

Villa are at full strength but Atkinson said: "I am not expecting a harder contest this season than we'll get from Leeds. They are very strong in midfield with a lot of depth all over, and are probably a better side now because they know that they can win the title." Atkinson is to give Hans Gilhaus, the Aberdeen for-ward, an extended trial with a view to a £500,000 transfer.

A tribunal yesterday ordered Luton Town to pay Cambridge United £160,000 for Steve Claridge with a further £50,000 payable after the forward has completed 50 appearances. Cambridge. had wanted £750,000.

Mark Loram, the forward dismissed by Torquay United after convictions for joyriding and indecent exposure, has been offered a one-month trial by West Ham United, who yesterday signed Matthew Holmes, a midfield player, for £100,000 from Bournemouth.

OLDHAM Athletic have lost an £825.000 sponsorship after Swissair pulled out of a threeyear contract with the Premier League club. The airline blamed disturbances involving England supporters durfavour but Stransaer have ing the European championship finals in Sweden for its

The deal was set up by David Worsley, 45, the station manager for Swissair at Manchester airport. Worsley, a lifelong Oldham supporter, put the idea to his superiors after Oldham's contract with their former sponsor. Bovis, came to an end.

"I thought it would work for everyone," Worsley said yesterday. "The company agreed and talks were set up. But after the hooligans rioted in Sweden, Swissair decided they didn't want to have anything to do with English football.

The Swiss are a very civilised bunch and brawling thugs are not the sort of publicity they need. It is very sad because Oldham is well known for being a family club without a violent hooligan element."

Alan Hardy, commercial manager of Oldham, said: Everything seemed set up but, after Sweden, Swissair decided they didn't want to go ahead with the deal. It is very sad that the stupid antics of hooligans in the European championship has reflected on the domestic game, especially

THE first capacity crowd of the Skol Cup this season will be present at Stair Park tonight for the third-round meeting of Stranraer and Rangers. It is a tie weighted overwhelmingly in Rangers' plausible reasons for believing they can cause an upset. Last Thursday, when the teams came out of the draw together, the Stranzaer directors decided against switching the tie to Hampden Park, as Dumbarton had done against Rangers in the previous round. That game attracted 11.000 spectators, a meagre audience by Rangers' standards, but more than double the capacity of Stair Park, which will accommodate something like 5,000 this The board felt that since, in recent years, the team has been drawn in cup competi-tions twice against Rangers and Airdrie, and once against Aberdeen and Celtic, all away from home, it was only fair to the small band of Stranraer supporters to save it another expensive round trip.

"I must admit I have mixed feelings about the decision," the Stranraer manager, Alex McAnespie, said yesterday. "On the one hand, I think we have done the decent thing by our supporters. However, like any manager, I would have been glad of the financial gain if we had played at Hampden. My feeling is that we would money we would have earned would have let me buy

Nevertheless, McAnespie relishes the possibilities offered by tonight's contest, especially in the light of Rangers' 4-3 defeat at Dens Park on Saturday. "Everybody knows that Rangers are particularly dangerous after a defeat but our players have had it Dundee earned their reward by carrying the game to Rang-ers. If it is at all possible, we will go at their defence as Dundee did and we will be positive. We will stretch them at every chance."

Strangaer can offer no more than flimsy opposition for the champions. McAnespie points out that they earned their place in the third round by disposing of the Scottish Cup finalists. Airdrieonians, at Broomfield last week after twice falling a goal behind.

Tour doubt remains unresolved

AUSTRALIA'S rugby union players deared the third hurdie of their four-match tour of South Africa in Port Elizabeth yesterday but the dispute rumbles on over whether they will complete the tour on Saturday by playing South Africa in Cape Town

An unattributed source in a Johannesburg newspaper yesterday suggested that Steve Tshwete, the sports spokes-man for the African National Congress (ANC), had turned against the tour, and there is a meeting today of the National and Olympic Sports Congress MOSCI.

The catalyst to the contin-uing dissatisfaction, which began in Johannesburg last Saturday with the unauthorised playing of the national anthems before the match between South Africa and New Zealand, is Louis Luyt. president of Transvaal RFU and a member of the South African Rugby Football Union

(Sarfu) executive. Luyt is still breathing defiance. "Just as the ANC are free to play their own anthem, sing their own songs, hoist their own flags, so they should allow others to do the same." he said on television. "I am no longer willing to stand in a corner."

There was a prominent hoarding at the Boet Erasmus Stadium before yesterday's match here, which the Australians won 34-8, bearing notice of Sarfu's support for peace and democracy. Although 1,000 pigeons were released over Port Elizabeth as symbols of peace, the Western Cape region of NOSC has called for the use of neutral symbols at matches. THE scrummage for power in rugby league is threatening to collapse into an unruly heap. With little more than a week to the start of the season, the professional and amateur sides of the game have em-barked on a disruptive beaveto which could land the sport on its backside.

At the centre of the trouble is the question of which body, amateur or professional, should control the development of youth rugby league and, after two decades of argument, the answer is nowhere in sight.

The Rugby Football League (RFL), which controls the professionals, and the British Amateur Rugby League AssoChristopher Irvine on a long-running dispute that has served to divide a

ciation (Baria) have been at each other's throats for most of the 19 years they have administered the separate branches of the game. Barla strengthen the amateur side of what had, since its creation in 1895, always been considered a professional game. Yesterday, feelings between the two bodies seemed to have reached a new high or low - with an extraordinary two-page statement issued by David Oxley, the RFL's chief executive. Oxley accused Barla of "poisoning young minds" by its decision to ban any of the young amateurs from its own leagues if they play in the Academy, the RFL's entirely separate youth league.

The Academy was launched by the professional clubs last season in order to promote

The two bodies have since ended peace talks brokered last year, and have been fixing bayonets in the sum-mer months. Baria has declared that it no longer recognises the Rugby League Academy. The RFL, in turn, has said it no longer recognises Barta.

In his statement vesterday Oxley said the trouble between the Rugby League and the amateur authorities had been caused entirely by Barla's "disgraceful" and "hateful piece of legislation". which effectively prevents amateurs playing in the Acadenty league. "This right is a basic tenet of the amateur ethos in sport. Any amateur sportsman must be free to choose where and when he will play," Oxley added.

By stripping youngsters of their amateur status, Barla will, indeed, be closing the doors on players who see the Academy as the way into the professional game, but who do not eventually make it.

Oxley said the Rugby League would be prepared to protect the amateur status of its Academy players, through the courts if necessary. He also took a swipe at the assumed growth of the amateur game, the basis for the Sports Council's £160,000 annual grant to Barla. "The [growth] figures claimed by Bada and contained in the documents submitted to the Sports Council, of which that body bases its grant aid to Baria, are Hans Christian Andersen gone mad," Oxley

Baria, needless to say, rejects that suggestion. "Just when will this seemingly endless and costly campaign to squash the amateur game cease?" Allan Gibb, the Barla chairman, said. "All the amateur game wants to do is to get on with its proven success in developing the game at grass-roots level and providing support for the profes-sional chibs."

will have supered at a time when it is seeking greater national recognition. On Oc-tober 24, Great Britain meet Australia in the World Cup final at Wembley, when the spotlight will be on the code. Before then, the RFI would do well to recall the pre-Barla days of the early Seventies when the game was disorganised and dying on its feet. The combined efforts of both sides have succeeded both sides have succeeded in resurrecting rugby league. Without conciliation, the bad old days could be a thing of the future.

The Sports Council may eventually be required to make the peace but by then
